It is a troubled time, with urgent calls upon our faithfulness. Great national issues are before the people, and once again the agony of the hapless victims of Turkish rule is pressed upon the conscience of this nation. Wisdom to judge righteous judgment, courage to dare for GOD and right, the passion of humanity that shall sweep down all ignoble obstacles, and be found at least striving and suffering where the stress is greatest, these things, demanded for the regeneration of our people, and for the honour of our country, will be given most surely to those who do not forget that their life is with GOD and can only be in His strength. In the quiet places of our prayer, the fire is kindled, the greatest issues of life are faced with singleness of mind and heart, not in self-seeking or in pride, but in the light of the divinest sanctions, under the touch of the greatest teachers and inspirers of our life.

So may it be with us all at this time! In no dead forms of worship, but in living prayer and earnest human fellowship, may we seek a new fulness of life and effective strength and wisdom for our service in the world! The work that is demanded of us is manifold in kind, and each one has his own post of duty. If the Church is not heedless of the greatest ssues, it will be the better fitted to fulfil every humbler function in the habitual ministry to all human needs, the care of its children, the offices of friendship, and the serious and abiding interests of good social order. Over the whole range of life the same spirit must prevail, the spirit of CHRIST'S faith and self-sacrifice, in the strength of the Eternal, the abiding communion of Righteousness and Love. The Church is called—that is to say, the people are called—to this high service. It is GOD who calls for true and faithful men, to do the work of His Kingdom.

TO SAVE MACEDONIA.

THE great meeting in St. James's Hall on Tuesday night, to which we refer elsewhere, is an index of the deep indignation aroused in all classes of the community at Mr. BALFOUR'S announcement of the determined inaction of his Government in face of the Macedonian crisis. Mr. BALFOUR "cannot think that any man of sober judgment can doubt that the best hope of dealing with it lies in the continued co-operation of Austria and Russia, strengthened by the support and aided by the advice of other signatories to the Treaty of Berlin." The present, he declares, is an occasion, "when two Powers are stronger for executive purposes than three; when, indeed, every addition to numbers carries with it a corresponding diminution of efficiency." Yet everyone, except MR. BALFOUR, must surely have become convinced by now that neither Austria nor Russia has any serious intention of taking effective measures to put a stop to the present ghastly carnage. The Chancellor of one of these Powers has given his opinion to the world that "the slaughter of some ten thousand Macedonian peasants is not an occurrence of such moment as to warrant complaints." Both have devoted far more energy to preventing Bulgaria from taking up the task they claim as their own than to enforcing their utterly inadequate scheme of reform. Indeed, it seems to be agreed between them that the enforcing of these reforms is to wait until the Porte has succeeded in suppressing the present rebellion.

Yet the suppression of the rebellion by Turkish soldiers and Bashi-Bazouks, involving, as it always does in Turkey, the wholesale slaughter and outrage of the non-combatant population, is exactly what it is the duty of Christian Europe to prevent. If every word Mr. BALFOUR says were true respecting the conduct of the insurgents—and many of his statements are vigorously controverted by their friends—the duty of the signatories of the Treaty of Berlin to step in would only become the more urgent. Men living under a Government which ignores all forms of protest against misrule but actual rebellion, and which invariably meets rebellion by a campaign of extermination, are not likely to conduct their revolt with the nice observance of the usages of war which a Great Power imposes upon its soldiers. But let the insurgents' misdeeds be what they may, our concern is with the population as a whole, who are being done to death before our eyes. To gird at the insurgents for not having rested satisfied with reforms which Mr. BALFOUR himself admits to have been inadequate, and which the Porte never seriously applied, is simply childish. It is still more childish, having proposed a scheme of reform for execution by the Turks, when the evil to be tackled is the existence of Turkish rule itself, to say that all would have been well if the Turk had been good enough to carry them out, and his subjects foolish enough to accept them as sufficient.

"He would be a bold critic," says Mr. Balfour, "who should confidently assert that more would have been got, and the more quickly, if more had been proposed." Nevertheless, that is exactly what any student of our dealings with Turkey in the past might have supposed himself free to assert, without fear of contradiction. If the Powers had announced, or would announce now, their decision to enter upon an occupation of Macedonia with a view to the appointment of a Christian Governor, responsible to them, though under the purely nominal suzerainty of the Sultan, empowered to form a body of gendarmerie under European officers, and to grant such local autonomy as time and the peculiar race conditions showed to be possible—"he would be a bold critic who should confidently assert" that the Porte would venture an attempt to prevent their carrying out their decision. Indeed, from 1878 onward, to go no further back, the Turks have had every reason to expect some such step to be taken. Mr. Bryce tells us that they know they must go, and that they "point out the gate in the wall of Constantinople through which they believe they will ultimately leave Europe." If they stay, it can only be as fellow-subjects of their Christian neighbours in a virtually Christian State.

In one respect, at least, we are in a better position in the struggle against the advocates of inaction to-day than we have been in other recent crises in the Near East. Our opponents virtually admit the reality of our responsibility in the matter. When the Armenians were being slaughtered, when the Cretans were fighting in the hills, there were Englishmen who declared, despite the Treaty of Berlin, and despite the Convention of Constantinople, that the sufferings of these peoples imposed no obligation of intervention upon us. But with regard to Macedonia, our responsibility is too patent for any such plea to be seriously advanced even for a moment. Save for our intervention at Berlin, the Bulgarian districts of Macedonia, where the worst of the atrocities are now being enacted, would have been added, as the result of the Russo-Turkish war, to the new Bulgarian principality. It was we who secured their retention under the Turkish yoke in return for promises of internal autonomy which have never been fulfilled. In place of this plain fact it is impossible for us, if we have any regard at all for our national honour, to say nothing of the dictates of common humanity, to deny the obligation laid upon us to rescue the Macedonians from the direct fruits of our policy in the present orgy of murder and outrage. We are bound, therefore, to do something more than quietly accept as sufficient the Austro-Russian invitation to the Sultan to promise the inauguration of futile reforms at such time as he shall have completed the extermination of the people in whose interests the reforms are proposed. History has shown us that the one way of securing good government within the Turkish Empire is to supersede the Turk, and England must see that he is superseded in Macedonia. If we fail here, there will remain upon our country, as the Bishop of Hereford has declared, a stain of indelible disgrace.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.*

I.

The Council's Work.

The eminent scholar and divine who does us the honour to preside over this session of our International Council, has eloquently uttered the prevailing sentiments and emotions of this significant occasion. With warm words of greeting and congratulation he has extended to our delegates and visitors a hearty welcome from his fellow-countrymen, and more especially from the distinguished association of liberal ministers, by whose kind invitation, and under whose friendly auspices, we are to hold this series of meetings in the metropolis of the Netherlands. It is with peculiar satisfaction that we accept this invitation to meet in Holland, a country so pre-eminent in the history of mankind for its love of liberty and free thought, and its heroic resistance to all oppression, whether of the body or of the mind.

Tribute to Holland.

For centuries it has been the home of freedom, education, and religious enlightenment, and the refuge of all who were persecuted for conscience sake; extending to them a generous hospitality, and entire freedom to think, speak, and worship in accordance with their own convictions. The English Nonconformists, fleeing from Churchly oppression; the Papist pursued by Protestant bigotry; the unhappy children of Israel, victims of an unchristian intolerance; the persecuted Anabaptists of Germany and Socinians of Eastern Europe, have here alike found shelter, safety, and freedom to worship God after their own mind and heart. For such a lesson in tolerance and Christian charity, and such illustrious service to the great cause of religious liberty, Holland deserves, and will ever receive, the grateful recognition of mankind. Small as is her territory and population compared with the great States of Europe and America, her attainment in Christian civilisation, and her contribution to the welfare of the race, place her among the first and greatest of nations.

We rejoice to know that the brave and lofty spirit of their ancestors still animates the Hollanders of to-day. It is no longer necessary—thank Heaven!—that in the interests of civilisation, they lead us in the arts of war. Theirs is a higher, diviner mission, to instruct us in the blessed ministries of Universal Peace. In the aims and activities of our kind hosts, the Vergadering van Moderne Theologen, and the Vrije Gemeente of Amsterdam, we recognise a spirit and purpose akin to that of our Council, the spirit of intellectual and religious liberty, of unfettered scientific investigation, and a broad, inclusive fellowship which looks beyond the boundaries of nationality and creed, and embraces the whole thinking, throbbing world in enlightened and fraternal sympathy.

One noble, inspiring presence we had hoped to meet, is, alas! no longer an inhabitant of earth. In the death of Professor Cornelius Tiele the twin causes of theological science and a spiritual Christianity have met with an unspeakable loss. May his gracious memory abide with us through the sessions of this congress and animate us with a like love of truth and humanity!

The London Meeting.

Two years and more have passed since our Council held its first general session in London under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In point of numbers, enthusiasm, unity of spirit, and the representative quality of those participating in it, this gathering far surpassed the expectation of its promoters. Fifteen countries and twenty-one different church connections were represented, officially or unofficially, among the delegates. The attendance at the public sessions ranged from 500 to 2,000 auditors. Addresses were made and papers contributed by twenty-five or more speakers, prominent in their respective countries and churches as advocates of "pure religion and perfect liberty." Many others, unable to come in person, sent messages of sympathy and congratulation. Friendly communications were also received from the Protestantenverein of Germany, the Protestantenbond of Holland, the American, British, and Hungarian Unitarian Associations, and other bodies. The meeting in London will ever be recalled with delight by all who attended it, because of its high ethical and religious tone, its broad, inclusive spirit, its constructive aims, its inspiring interchanges of thought and feeling, and a social entertainment which, through the thoughtful and generous provision of our English hosts, was perfection itself.

Object of the Council.

The success attending this first international gathering of religious liberals justified and confirmed the faith of those who called it into existence. It showed convincingly that the formation of this Council was timely and needed, and that we had inaugurated a movement of far-reaching importance to the cause of liberal religion. The object of the Council is briefly stated in the first of the two declarations which constitute its only articles of association, to be as follows: "to open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them." It is a movement to bring into closer union for the exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims, the historic liberal churches, the scattered liberal congregations, and isolated workers for religious freedom in many lands. It is an attempt to unite for effective sympathy and co-operation, religious liberals of different nationalities and church connections for their mutual encouragement and benefit, and the spread of religious freedom and enlightenment throughout the world. Our experience thus far confirms the belief that nativity and language form no insurmountable barrier to such an international union of hands and hearts for the religious emancipation of mankind. We are convinced that all who unite with us will feel themselves encouraged and strengthened, and will grow in influence through the consciousness of larger and fraternal relations with the great liberal movement in religion now going on, under various names and auspices, throughout the world. Religion itself can but be the gainer in breadth and charity, in purity of content and power of expression through such a union of free and progressive minds. Its dogmatic and traditional limitations will the sooner tend to disappear, its universal elements will become more apparent. A widespread and effective sympathy will take the place of local prejudices and hostilities.

* Report of the Executive Committee of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, presented at Amsterdam, on Wednesday, Sept. 2, by the Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendte.

International Activities.

The time which has elapsed since our last general congress has been prolific of labours and results for the good of our cause.

The principles and aims of our association have been widely advertised through an extended correspondence, the reports and editorials of friendly journals, and, especially, through the publication of the proceedings and papers of the London meeting in a convenient volume, edited by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, under the attractive title, "Liberal Religious Thought at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century." We are happy to announce that a large edition of this publication has been disposed of, and that, with this encouraging example before them, our Dutch friends have undertaken the issue of a similar volume to contain the proceedings and papers of the present session of the Council.

Another notable fruit of our International Council has been the greatly increased intercommunication between religious liberals of different nationalities and church connections which has been so striking a feature of the past two years. Thus in Great Britain, at the last session of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, representatives were present from France, Germany, Belgium, Scandinavia, and the United States, as well as India and Japan, and received a warm welcome. In reciprocation, the British Association, during the year, sent its honoured president, Rev. R. A. Armstrong, to convey its fraternal greetings to the Free Church Association of Denmark, and the Protestantenbond of Holland. A party of thirty English Unitarians attended the opening of the new Unitarian College buildings at Koloszvar, Hungary. British delegates were present also at the annual meetings of the American Unitarian Association in Boston; while the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, whose recent death is so deeply lamented, represented them in India.

The "Inquirer" Anniversary.

A remarkable expression of this growing fraternity between free-thinkers the world over, was afforded by the observance of the 60th anniversary of the founding of the INQUIRER, the ably edited and influential organ of Liberal Christianity in Great Britain. On this occasion there appeared in its columns the felicitations of representative liberals from nearly every civilised nation of the globe, an impressive testimony to the growth of religious sympathy between men of advanced opinions and free spirit in all lands.

Interest in America.

Similarly in the United States of America there had been a noticeable increase of interest in our International cause on the part of liberal believers. At recent sessions of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, and of the American Unitarian Association, resolutions of regard and sympathy for our International Council have been adopted. Professor B. D. Eerdmans, D.D., of Leiden, representing the Dutch Protestantenbond, Professor Masaryk, of the University of Prague, Rev. Alfred Altherr of Basel, a delegate from the Swiss Association for Free Christianity, and others, have been warmly received and listened to with deep interest. The Christian Register of Boston, to whose editor, Rev. George Bachelor, we owe the happy phrase in our Council's statement of purpose: "Pure Religion and Perfect Liberty"; the Chicago Unity, and other liberal journals of the United States, have devoted a large amount of space to the furtherance of our Council and its aims. The American Unitarian Association sends to the present Congress its honoured president to bear us its greetings, and to head a delegation of some twenty-five other Americans. Among these we are pleased to observe the President of the Free Religious Association of America; a notable and influential association of free-thinkers, of which Ralph Waldo Emerson was one of the founders.

Correspondence.

The large correspondence conducted by the General Secretary, by Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Prof. B. D. Eerdmans, and other members of our Executive Committee has shown the existence of a most gratifying interest in our cause. The organisation of our Council has been hailed with enthusiasm and thankfulness alike by liberal Church fellowships and isolated free believers. Men and women of diverse nationalities and religious antecedents have welcomed it as an element of strength and hope in their often desperate struggles against dogmatic narrowness and ecclesiastical tyranny. Even in countries and churches where the battle for free thought has been fought and won, and liberty of speech and worship is in no wise restricted, such as England and Switzerland, our Council is greeted with joy as offering them an enlarged outlook, an increased sense of dignity and power, a new consciousness of missionary opportunity and duty, and a welcome means of escape from a contracted denominationalism and dull churchly routine. Its mission is generally recognised to be of importance to all who are in earnest with their liberalism—to lift the vision, quicken the conscience, encourage the heart, and strengthen the hands of all who believe in a religion of reason, character, and spirituality.

(To be concluded.)

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MODERN STREET PLAY.

FEW people, probably, when they see at some street corner a performance of that delight of our childhood, a Punch and Judy Show, connect it in any intimate way with the productions of Sir Henry Irving or Mr. Tree. And yet it is none the less true that the two can be traced back to a common ancestry, and that in the antics of the modern street show we may see in a debased form the beginnings of our highly developed dramatic art with its cultured performers and its realistic scenic effects.

The Punch and Judy Show of to-day is, in form, almost identical—though much reduced in size, of course—with that of the old Miracle and Mystery Plays, which were performed from the twelfth century onward in this country.

The first of these representations was given, or at any rate the first of which there is any record, in 1110, and was the composition of a certain Geoffrey, master of the Abbey School at Dunstable; the subject of the play was "St. Catherine," the parts being taken by his scholars and the costumes borrowed from the Abbey of St. Albans; while in 1174 we hear of London having "for its theatrical exhibitions, religious plays either the representation of miracles wrought by holy confessors or the sufferings of martyrs."

Primitive Drama.

Some of the miracle and mystery plays performed were of a very ambitious character and subjects which would certainly not be put upon a modern stage at all were treated with a freedom, and often a levity, that seem strangely far removed from our ideas. The Three Persons of the Trinity were constantly represented with the greatest familiarity, while the Creation, the Flood, the Fall, Adam and Eve, the Nativity, the Crucifixion, and a variety of similar sacred subjects, were all made the subject of dramatic presentation, excursions also being made into apocryphal literature and the lives of the saints. In one of these plays, called the "Mystery of the Acts of the Apostles," given in Paris in 1541, there were as many as four hundred and eighty-five characters; it was given under clerical supervision and patronage, and heaven and hell and earth were all represented, together with the dwellers therein, from the greatest even to the least.

The Stage.

In England, as on the Continent, the presentations of these religious dramas spread, and in the large cities the trades-guilds generally took the matter in hand, notably in the case of Chester, Coventry, York and London. As a general rule, the scale of the performances was less ambitious than that at Paris, alluded to above, and the stage on which they were rendered was like our Punch and Judy show apparatus on a larger scale. The form differed slightly according to the requirements of the piece. In some there were three platforms one above the other, the top one representing heaven, the second earth, and the third the infernal regions; while with others, the second story was reserved for the saints, and the third for men, the lower regions being just to the side of the latter. Others again, had but two divisions (like the modern street show), one being used as a dressing-room, and the upper one for acting. An interesting account survives of the method of procedure at the playing of the Chester Mysteries, which were acted for the last time in 1574. "Every company" (i.e., the city guilds) "had his pagiante or parte, which pagiantes were a high scaffolde with two rowmes, a higher and a lower, upon 4 wheeles. In the lower they apparalled themselves, in the higher rowme they played, being all open on the tope, that all behoulders might heare and see them. The places where they played them was in every streete.

A Full Itinerary.

"They begane first at the Abay Gates, and when the pagiante was played, it was wheeled to the High Cross before the Mayor, and so to every streete, and so every street had a pagiante playing before them, till all the pagiantes for the days appointed were played, and when one pagiante was neere ended, word was brought from streete to streete, that soe the might come in place thereof exceeding orderlye, and all the streetes had their pagiantes afore them, all at one time playing together, to se which playes was great resort, and also scafoldes and stages made in the streetes in those places where they determined to playe theire pagiantes."*

Some of the subjects presented to the people in this way are curious and interesting.

The York Guilds, at the festival of Corpus Christi, arranged that each trade should provide a "pagiante," every one of them taking some part of the Bible, and rendering it in dramatic form. Those responsible are told in one proclamation, that the craftsmen are to "bring forth their pageants in order and course, by good players, well arrayed, and openly speaking, upon pain of one hundred shillings to be paid to the chamber without pardon; and that every player be ready in his pageant at convenient time, that is to say, at betwixt four and five of the clock in the morning, and then all other pageantes following each after the other in order without delay, upon pain of six shillings and eightpence."

Some Ambitious Subjects.

A regulation of these "playes" in 1415 shows that there were actually fifty-four subjects taken, and presented by the various trades. Some of them are curious, and one can hardly avoid the conclusion that there must have been a good deal left to the spectators' imagination, especially in regard to scenic effects. The first, taken by the tanners of the city of York, was "God the Father Almighty creating and forming the heavens, angels, archangels, Lucifer and the angels that fell with him into hell." Then followed the creation "of the earth and all that is therein in the space of five days," which was undertaken by the plasterers!

The creation of Adam and Eve came next, and so on, all through the Old and New Testaments. The York mysteries were continued annually up to the year 1584, and as they were originally introduced in 1250, they maintained their position in the popular esteem for two hundred and thirty-four years, being revised and brought up to date from year to year. The various corporations and towns used to vie one against the other in the production and presentation of these various dramatic efforts, and certainly the results attained by some of the composers of these pieces were both striking and original. Imaginary characters were freely introduced, while the interpretations given to various biblical characters would astonish a good many students of Holy Writ. One wonders, for example, why the wife of Noah should be represented as a shrew as she is both in the Chester plays and in the Newcastle mystery, entitled "Noah's Ark; or, the Shipwright's ancient play or dirge."

"Paradise Lost" and its Origin.

There was evidently a sense of the fitness of things in giving this particular subject to that particular guild, though the introduction of the Devil as one of the characters in the production is of doubtful historical accuracy, to say the least. It is, perhaps, worth notice in passing that our great English epic, "Paradise Lost," is said to have been suggested to Milton by a mystery play entitled Adam and Eve, which he saw in Italy.

In addition to these mysteries there were the morality plays, whose object was to inculcate some moral lesson or other, and in which the characters represented certain virtues and vices—duty, charity, love, good deeds, riches, and so on—and of these, perhaps, the best was the piece recently so admirably revived, entitled, "Every Man." Few, however, were up to the high level of that production.

From about 1570 we hear less and less of these religious plays, their place being taken, of course, by the Elizabethan drama in all its newborn splendour. No longer were the movable theatres taken from street to street on their "four wheels"; the drama found its new home in more permanent buildings; but the popularity of the old movable show was not quite gone, and it has survived, in a humbler form, even to this day.

Mr. Punch a Teacher of Morals.

The strolling players, or the members of guilds, or the scholars of the Abbey or Cathedral schools, have been superseded by mere manipulated puppets, and the "four wheels" have been reduced to two, but to all intents and purposes you may see a "morality" performed to-day at the street corner. It is changed, modernised, and popularised, but the plot is really summary retribution overtaking wickedness, and though the name and idea of Punch is said to be of Italian origin, it is probable that the play as performed now is much more nearly akin to one of the old moralities than to the antics of the drunken vintager, who is said to have given us the familiar name of Punch.

An old account of a "poppet show of the creation of the world," which was performed at Bath in 1709, tells us how, when in the course of the performance, "we came to Noah's Flood in the show, Punch and his wife were introduced dancing in the ark"; and a playbill of a puppet showman of the reign of Anne seems also clearly to establish the way in which Punch and sacred subjects were associated; for after setting forth time and place of the performance of an "opera," called the "Old Creation of the World" and "Noah's ark," in which may be seen "Noah and his family coming out of the ark, with all the beasts two and two and all the fowls of the air seen in a prospect sitting upon trees," it proceeds to inform the public: "Likewise machines descend from above, double and treble, with Dives rising out of Hell and Lazarus seen in Abraham's bosom, besides several figures dancing jigs, sarabands and country dances, to the admiration of the spectators; with the merry conceits of Squire Punch and Sir John Spendall."

A Long Ancestry.

And, going further back than this even, students of Shakespeare may remember the passage in "The Winter's Tale" (Act 4, Sc. 2), where Autolycus describes the imaginary individual who has robbed him as having been "since an ape bearer, then a process server, a bailiff; then he compassed a motion of the Prodigal Son," &c. Motion was the term for a play by puppets, and this reference takes us nearly back to the miracle plays themselves.

The connection is completed by a writer in 1570, who refers to an Interlude of the Resurrection of Christ, played at Witney, near Oxford, "in the days of ceremonial religion," in which "the priestes garnished out certain small puppets representing the persons of Christ, the watchman, Marie and others"; and the writer records having seen some similar production "in Poule's Church, London."*

Punch and Judy, like many human friends, have come down in the world, and have ceased to be the cynosure of all eyes when they visit the village or the town; but for the thoughtful eye of the student they have still an interest of their own, and looking at their grotesque antics, he may travel back over the years, to a time when their predecessors on that humble stage fulfilled the part of a real though crude educational force in the country, and expressed also religious ideas, which, however far removed from modern methods and conceptions, were yet real enough to those who held them.

A CITY UNIVERSITY.

SIR,—In a "Note of the Week" in your issue of September 19, referring to Sir Norman Lockyer's presidential address at Southport, you say that he enforced his argument for extending, improving, and systematising our national provision for higher education "by copious quotations from the very men—Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Balfour, the Duke of Devonshire, and the rest—best placed to carry out themselves the improvements they advocate, but who have instead used their opportunities merely to hamper and disorganise—to use no stronger terms—that elementary education, a sure grounding in which is the only possible basis for an efficient course of higher instruction."

Leaving on one side the question whether elementary education is, or is going to be, hampered and disorganised by the recent Acts, may I point out to you that of "the very men" Mr. Chamberlain, at least, has not been content to use his opportunities "merely" to deal with elementary education. As a member of the Staff I have been associated from the beginning with the movement which has led to the foundation and development of the University of Birmingham. I know, as everyone in the University knows, that Mr. Chamberlain has thrown himself heart and soul into the movement and has been our leader throughout. When his duties as a Minister must have been almost overwhelming, he has still found time to give much thought and hard work to the affairs of the University. He has insisted that its equipment, on some lines, at least, should be such as to place it on a level with the best German and American Universities which are being held up to us as models. By his own personal efforts he has made this possible.

Mr. Chamberlain has used his opportunities to found a City University in place of a Federal Institution. The future development of provincial Universities in England has been, thereby, entirely changed—changed I believe entirely for the better.

REGISTRAR-GENERAL'S REPORT FOR 1901.

THE report of the Registrar-General of England and Wales for the year 1901 has just been issued, and we are indebted to a friend for the following particulars:—

The births registered during the year in England and Wales numbered 929,807, being the greatest number on record; but the birth-rate was not the highest, inasmuch as the population had increased, and in the middle of 1901 it amounted to 32,621,263. The proportion of boys born to girls was as 1,040 to 1,000; but in the matter of deaths, 1,147 males died to 1,000 females. The number of illegitimate children born was the lowest on record, and the permillage was, consequently, the lowest also. This figure stood at about 2·2 per thousand of the population down to 1865, and from that date it has shown a steady decline down to 1·1, where it now stands. Still the total number born in the year was 36,199.

Turning next to the deaths, we may recall the fact that an epidemic of small-pox broke out in London in the autumn of the year; yet the total number of deaths resulting from that disease in England and Wales during the whole year was only 356, with a possible addition of a few more out of a list of 115, which were recorded as due to chicken-pox. War also is less fatal than might be supposed; the deaths in the Army abroad (in South Africa), numbered only 5,457, out of 286,152 men. As against these figures, accident or negligence caused 17,312 deaths, cancer 27,487, diarrhœa 30,121, pneumonia 37,413, bronchitis over 50,000, and consumption 58,930. The deaths from cancer are increasing year by year, while those from consumption are declining.

The number of marriages celebrated in 1901 was 259,400, which has only once been exceeded, namely in 1899, when the number was 262,334. Of these marriages 172,679, or 666 per 1,000, were Church of England marriages. This number was exceeded in each of the three preceding years, and the percentage, or rather permillage, is the lowest on record. In 1841, when the present system opened, Church marriages were 934 per 1,000; but from that time to the present the proportion of them has constantly, though not quite regularly declined. Thus, in in 1894 it stood at 686, and in 1898 at 685, but since the last-mentioned date the figures have been in 1899, 678, in 1900, 672, in 1901, 666, a decline of 19 per 1,000 in three years. The non-Church marriages in 1901 were 86,721, or 334 per 1,000, just over one-third of the total. Of this number, 10,624 were Roman Catholic marriages, a number exceeded in 1899, but in no other year; but the permillage was 41, which has often been exceeded.

Protestant-Nonconformist marriages were 33,135, the highest number on record, and the permillage was also equal to the highest, namely, 128 per 1,000, which was attained in 1900, but never before. These were again divisible as follows: 104 per 1,000 by a registrar, 24 per 1,000 by a person authorised under the recent Act of Parliament. Jewish marriages were 1,813 in number, or 7 per 1,000, the highest on record in both cases; and civil marriages were 41,067 in number, and 158 per 1,000, likewise both the highest.

Alienation from the Church, however, is not uniform over the whole country; in Wales and Monmouthshire it is most marked, while Cornwall, Northumberland, Durham, and Devonshire come next. Rutland, Huntingdon, and Hertford show the greatest proportion of Church marriages, but in Rutland only 139 marriages were celebrated in the whole year. Roman Catholics are strongest in Lancashire, where the marriages in 1901 were 107 per 1,000; next came Durham, 78, Northumberland 77, the North Riding of Yorkshire 74, and Cumberland 70. Leaving little Rutland out of account, Protestant-Nonconformists are weaker in London than anywhere else, while Jews are stronger; the numbers per 1,000 for London being: Church 710, Roman Catholic 37, Protestant-Nonconformist 45, Jews 32, Civil 176.

It is a hopeful sign that the percentage of minors marrying is decreasing. In the five years ending with 1880, in every thousand marriages there were on an average 77·8 minors amongst the husbands, and 217 amongst the wives. Since that date, the proportion has regularly declined, and in 1901 the figures stood at 50 for husbands and 160 for wives.

Illiterates are rapidly becoming extinct. In each 1,000 marriages only 25 husbands and 29 wives made a mark instead of signing their names. Fifty years ago, the numbers were 305 for men and 446 for women, but these numbers have regularly and until quite recently rapidly declined; and not a few of our present illiterates are foreigners who land on our shores.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS AND CONFERENCE.

THE annual sermons of the Association were preached on Sunday, September 27, by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, of London, in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, to good congregations, and special collections were taken on behalf of the funds of the Association.

On Monday afternoon, the business meeting was held in the church, the following churches being represented:—Byker, Carlisle, Choppington, Gateshead, Middlesborough, Stockton-on-Tees, Sunderland, and South Shields. In the absence of the retiring president, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., the chair was occupied by the Rev. Frank Walters, who extended a hearty welcome to the ministers, delegates, and visitors from the district churches. The report of the Committee was submitted by Mr. E. H. Coysh, and the statement of accounts was presented by Mr. J. Duncan Donald.

The report opened with a reference to the impetus received from the autumnal meeting of the B. and F.U.A. at Newcastle last year, and to the value of special lectures delivered by the Rev. F. Walters on "Was Jesus God?" and the Rev. H. V. Mills on "Evolution and Religion." The removal of the Rev. Arthur Harvie to Northampton was noted, while Mr. T. Paxton had withdrawn from South Shields, to prepare for entrance to Manchester College, Oxford. The Darlington pulpit also remained vacant. Reference was made to the value of Mr. Walter Glover's work at Choppington, and to the steady work of the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, C. Travers, F. Wood, and H. Cross, at Middlesbrough, Carlisle, Sunderland, and Stockton respectively. The accounts, with a total of £277 7s. 2d., showed the balance in hand of £4 18s. 2d. increased to £36 12s. 2d., due, no doubt, to the vacant pulpits in the district. The B. and F.U.A. grants for the year amounted to £148 15s.; the annual subscriptions to £81 17s. 6d.

The report and financial statement were accepted and adopted on the motion of Mr. Vincent Errington (Newcastle-on-Tyne), and Mr. W. J. Watson (Thornaby-on-Tees). On the motion of Mrs. Francis Wood (Sunderland) and Mrs. John Tweedy (Newcastle-on-Tyne), a resolution of thanks was accorded to the retiring president, officers, and committee. Mr. W. J. Watson was unanimously elected to the presidential chair for the ensuing year on the motion of the Revs. Charles Travers and Francis Wood. The retiring officers and committee were re-elected.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. Charles Carter (Newcastle) and seconded by Mr. Walter Glover (Choppington), was carried by acclamation :—

That the best thanks of the members of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association be, and are hereby, accorded to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie for his valuable services in the pulpit yesterday, and further, through him we tender to the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association our best thanks for the very generous support given to this Association.

This closed the formal business of the meeting, which was followed immediately by the conference, at which the Rev. Francis Wood (Sunderland) read an interesting paper entitled, "To Organise, or not to Organise," dealing with some of the proposals made at the National Triennial Conference at Liverpool. A lengthy discussion followed, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the reader of the paper. The annual tea was held in the school-room adjoining, the ladies of the Dorcas Benevolent Society presiding.

A public meeting was held in the church in the evening, the chair being occupied by the newly elected president, who was supported by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, A. Irvine Innes, Kilmarnock (representing the Scottish Unitarian Association), Frank Walters, W. H. Lambelle, and F. Wood, Captain W. Lowrie, treasurer, and E. H. Coysh, secretary. The Rev. Frank Walters extended a hearty welcome to the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and A. Irvine Innes, and in response both gentlemen delivered vigorous and effective addresses, which were highly appreciated.

The Garden City Company having now practical work in hand in realisation of their scheme, is attracting considerable attention from the newspapers, and it was discussed by the British Association at Southport. In conference it comes out clearly that the ownership of the land by the community, and therefore of the increment of value given by increasing population, is at the foundation of the project. The company will not build the city. It will lay out general plans, reserving spaces for parks and other public purposes, but will let part of the land to manufacturers and others to build upon in conformity with the general plan. An important point was raised in the course of the British Association discussion: how far the company can wisely provide for general requirements by constructing subways under the streets when they are first laid out, and by supplying Mond gas, gas stoves, and smokeless house fuel. The economy of making such engineering arrangements at the first laying out of the city, but, at the same time, the need for care in the initial sinking of capital, are among the points which will doubtless receive serious consideration.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

HARVEST THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

In addition to those noted below, we have news of Thanksgiving Services at the following places:—

Blackley.—Preacher, Rev. G. Street, of Buxton, former minister of the chapel.

Blackpool: North Shore.—Preacher, Rev. J. C. Pollard, of Lancaster.

Bermondsey. — Preacher, Rev. Principal Gordon.

Halstead.—Preacher, Rev. A. Farquharson.

Maidstone.—Preacher, Rev. S. S. Brettell.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe. — Preacher, Rev. A. H. Dolphin. The special music included a rendering of Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm.

Aberdeen.—The open-air meetings conducted by Rev. A. Webster this season have some points worthy of special notice. They began on June 14, and were continued (with a holiday break in August) till September 20. The first nine were held in the hollow of the Broad Hill, and the attendance ranged from 200 to 1,100. On September 13 and 20 Mr. Webster used the Pierrotts' stage at the beach, and on the first day, in spite of wind and rain, four hundred persons assembled. The second Sunday was bright, and the audience numbered over 1,200. A third meeting was arranged for the 27th, but the rain prevented it. The stage was previously used by a Free Church congregation, and a choir and soloists made attractions. Mr. Webster trusted to his address alone, and his meetings were as large, but more settled and attentive. The beach is now a popular Sunday resort, and a different audience was gathered there. Many of those who listened to Mr. Webster heard Unitarian ideas expressed for the first time. The close attention to the address was remarkable. Mr. Webster has proved that "the common people" are still glad to hear the Gospel of Jesus.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—On Monday evening a large and representative congregational meeting was held, to bid farewell to the Rev. L. P. Jacks and Mrs. Jacks, on their removal to Oxford, where Mr. Jacks takes up this month his duties as Professor of Philosophy in Manchester College. Mr. Percy W. Crosskey presided, and among those present were the Right Hon. W. Kenrick and Mrs. Kenrick, Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Poynting, Dr. and Mrs. Simon, Ald. and Mrs. C. G. Beale, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Kenrick, Mr. and Mrs. Priestley Smith, Mrs. Nettlefold, and Mrs. H. W. Crosskey. Among the letters of regret for absence were those from Mr. B. Kenrick (senior warden), Mr. Austen Chamberlain, M.P., and Mr. Jesse Collings, M.P. The chairman paid a warm tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Jacks for the services they had rendered the church during the nine years of their connection with it, and on behalf of the congregation presented to Mr. Jacks a cheque for a thousand guineas and to Mrs. Jacks a silver tea and coffee service of rich design, together with an illuminated address. Mr. Jacks, in acknowledging the gifts, thanked the congregation heartily for the great loyalty which they had always shown towards his office. He did not think that the address recognised the distance which existed between his ideals and his actual performances. Still it was true charity to give a man credit for his intentions. He left the pulpit with the greatest confidence to his successor, the Rev. J. W. Austen. Mrs. Jacks also added a few words of grateful acknowledgment.

Bolton: Unity Church.—A window to the memory of the late Frank Taylor, J.P., was unveiled during morning service last Sunday, two of his own hymns being among those which were sung. The window was unveiled and presented to the congregation by Mr. J. J. Bradshaw on behalf of the subscribers, and accepted by Mr. Fairbrother, chairman of the congregation. Mr. Bradshaw, who spoke with much feeling, in the course of his address read some passages from a letter of the Rev. H. M. Livens, a former minister of the church, who had hoped to be present. Having spoken of the devoted spirit of Mr. Taylor's life, Mr. Livens added:—"It is fitting that our memorial should be a window through whose design the sunshine of God shall pass, making the figures and traceries as beautiful in form and colour as the spirit shining through our souls makes them beautiful in thought and deed. It will be a fresh inspiration to Unity; the picture of man's labour with the blessing of God resting upon it; a lasting token of how precious is the memory of him who proved his love to God by his service to man." The window consists of five panels of design and colour, through which the light streamed in beautiful harmony, diffusing a glory of beauty which recalled the words, "Thou shalt worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." The three central panels are illustrative of "The Sermon on the Mount." Christ is shown seated upon an elevated portion under the shade of the Olives. Around him are grouped listeners of all sorts and conditions, Disciples, Scribes, Pharisees, Soldiers, Youth and Old Age, Mother and Child, symbolising the eternal and all-pervading truths of the Beatitudes. But the face of Christ here depicted is not the conventional portrait of the suffering Jesus. Here we see reflected the glory of the pure in heart that hath seen God. They are the features of the calm, resolute thinker, and suggestive of the teacher who was wont to preface his teachings with "How think ye." His lessons are symbolised in the picture by "the fowls of the air," "the lilies of the field," "the thistles," and "the city on the hill." On a set of eight vignettes above the large panels are the figures of angels, each holding a scroll on which is inscribed the words, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The two side panels are of ornamental design. At the foot inscriptions record the dedication of the window. After prayer of consecration, the Rev. Wilfrid Harris, M.A., preached from the words of the inscription: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." In clear interpretations he defined the various messages contained in those beautiful traceries of form and colour, and, likening the city shown in the background to a city of God, he said: "Do your duty to your neighbour and your life as a citizen in the city of God. Nor can I think that any other lesson would be more pleasing to him in whose memory we have placed this memorial here, as a thank-offering to God, for the life he lived among us, and for his labours of love for his country, for his city, and for his church." Speaking of the public activity of Mr. Taylor, he said: "Mr. Frank Taylor ever felt that the greatness of a nation depended ultimately upon its religious life. For him the inward vision of God was ever a call to public as well as private duty, and every call to duty, public or private, a fresh call to consecretion, and a prayerful seeking of strength from God. Most dear to him was this church, where Sunday by Sunday, he sought and found religious fellowship in the quiet hour of praise and prayer. May this memorial to him in this place help us to seek more earnestly the clear vision of God in our own hearts. As week by week the light of heaven shines through this window and upon the figure of Christ, so may the light of God shine in upon our hearts, and discover there, week by week, a more Christ-like life." The window has been designed and executed by Messrs. Heaton, Butler & Bayne, of London, under the supervision of Messrs. Bradshaw & Gass, F.R.I.B.A., of Bolton.

Colne.—A pleasant Saturday evening—the first of a series—was held under the auspices of the newly formed "Ladies' Guild," on Sept. 26, in the schoolroom, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion. An excellent programme of instrumental music was performed by the Burnley Trafalgar-street Orchestral Band. Recitations were given by Miss B. Mackie, of Burnley, and songs were sung by ladies of the Colne congregation. Refreshments were sold at moderate charges and eagerly purchased by the audience, which was large and appreciative. On Sunday evening the Rev. Robert McGee preached to a good congregation upon "England and Turkey," and protested strongly against the apathy of the former in regard to the terrible things that are taking place in Macedonia.

Darlington.—The congregation of the Unitarian Church has unanimously passed a resolution expressing horror at the Macedonian outrages and imploring the Government to use every means to bring them to an end.

Huddersfield.—The following protest was adopted by the congregation of Fitzwilliam-street Church on Sunday evening last after a sermon by the minister, the Rev. W. Mellor, on "The New Cry from Macedonia":—"That this congregation, assembled in the Christian name, for the worship of the one God and Father of all mankind, enters its solemn protest against the scenes of unspeakable iniquity still being enacted in Macedonia, and solemnly calls upon His Majesty's Government to intervene in accordance with the Berlin Treaty, either alone or in conjunction with other European Powers, in order to put an end to the rapine, lust, and murder that are a dishonour to our common humanity and a foul blot on our common religion. And furthermore resolves that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to the Right Honourable Arthur James Balfour, the Prime Minister, and to Sir James T. Woodhouse, member of Parliament for the Borough of Huddersfield."

Hull.—On Thursday evening, Sept. 24, the Rev. F. H. and Mrs. Vaughan, on their return from their wedding tour, were "at home" to the members of the Park-street Church. The meeting on both sides was most cordial, and good wishes for the continued happy relations between the minister and his congregation were freely exchanged. During the evening Mr. S. Harris, on behalf of the congregation, presented Mr. and Mrs. Vaughan with a purse of gold, as a token of the sincere regard and welcome which all had desired to give expression to on that occasion.

Liverpool District Missionary Association.—On Sunday next, October 4, the Rev. R. P. Farley, B.A., late Senior Student of Manchester College, Oxford, enters on his duties as Missionary to the Association in succession to the Rev. H. D. Roberts, who has joined the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the ministry of Hope-street Church. Mr. Farley is to preach at St. Helens, Widnes, and Garston on successive Sundays, other preachers sharing with him the work of ministry in these places. At Widnes there is already an iron church, and two more are being provided for St. Helens and Garston.

Liverpool (Hope-street Church).—On Wednesday evening a congregation soirée was held for the purpose of welcoming the Rev. H. D Roberts and Mrs. Roberts on his joining the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the ministry of the church.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The session opened, as usual, with a devotional service, which was held on Tuesday evening, September 29, at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth. The Rev. W. J. Jupp conducted the service, and the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst preached the sermon, taking for his subject "We are all God's fellow-workers." In an earnest and helpful address, Mr. Hirst pointed out that, as in the natural world we are called upon to be fellow-workers with God, so it is in the spiritual world; and, having shown the responsibilities of parents and the need for them to live pure and good lives as an example to their children, he said that Sunday-school teachers could help a good deal by their influence and affection for their scholars, and, by so helping them, become fellow-workers with God. At the close of the service the teachers adjourned to the meeting-room, where refreshments were provided, and the President, the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, announced that on Saturday, October 10, Mr. Cooper would commence a course of lectures for teachers on "How to deal with demonstrations," to be given at the Mill-street Mission at 5 p.m.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday next at the evening service, Barnby's Rebekah will be sung by an augumented choir.

Selby (Opening of a new Chapel).—The old chapel, which dated back to 1699, having been for some years unfit for use, a new building has been erected on the old site, a chapel to seat 125, built of red brick, with three-light lattice windows. On Thursday, Sept. 24, the new chapel was opened by Mr. Basil Lupton, the acting trustee, in presence of a large company, including a considerable number of members of other churches in the town. The opening anthem was "O come let us worship," and in the course of the service Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was rendered by a special choir. The Rev. J. Dale read the lessons, and the prayer of dedication was offered by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, who also preached an able and helpful sermon from Ephes. iv. 11, 12. The Rev. C. Hargrove, who was to have been the preacher, was prevented by a funeral from being present until later in the day. After tea in the old school-room, of which 150 partook, in two sittings-down, a public meeting was held in the chapel. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, took the chair, supported by the Revs. C. Hargrove, E. C. Jones, J. Fox, C. H. Cook, F. H. Williams, W. H. Eastlake, H. Thomas, and J. Dale, minister of the chapel. After the chairman's address, Mr. Dale read a paper tracing the history of the congregation, both before and after the building of the chapel of 1699; Mr. A. Abbey proposed, Mr. R. Knott seconded, and Mr. Harvey Cook supported a vote of thanks to the trustees and donors, which was acknowledged by Mr. Basil Lupton, and encouraging addresses were then given by the other ministers present. A vote of thanks to the visitors brought the meeting to a close. Among the gifts to the new chapel are 50 chairs from Miss Jones, a member of the congregation; a pulpit Bible from Miss Sharpe, of London; and a Communion table from Mr. James Abbey, of Bradford. Subscriptions to the building fund are still required, and may be sent to Mr. Basil Lupton, 24, East Parade, Leeds.

Stannington.—Successful harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, Sept. 20, the preachers being the Rev. A. H. Dolphin and the Rev. Iden Payne. On the following evening the choir gave a service of song, entitled "Amongst the Corn."

Stockport.—Alderman Giles Atherton, a member of the Unitarian Church, who was Mayor of Stockport in Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee Year, and also in 1898, has accepted nomination for another year of service as chief magistrate of his native town. He was born in Stockport in 1852.

Swansea.—At the harvest festival services last Sunday the Rev. W. Tudor Jones preached morning and evening. In the afternoon a children's service was held, and excellent addresses were delivered by the Rev. T. Sinclair Evans, Congregational minister, late President of the South Wales Congregational Union of English Churches, and Miss Manning, B.A., eldest daughter of the Rev. J. E. Manning, formerly minister of the church.

VERSION PREPARED BY M. PRITCHARD.

With Introduction and Notes.

(Cloth, 8vo., red edges, price 3s. 6d.)

In this book an attempt has been made to get nearer to the meaning of the original by omitting some passages now held by many students to be interpolations, and also by first comparing several translations in order to select that word or phrase which seemed to convey the truest sense. It is hoped that by this means the great beauty, and wonderful teaching of this ancient masterpiece may be brought more clearly before the notice of the general reader.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties is to meet on Wednesday at Highgate, when at the morning service the Rev. J. J. Marten will be the preacher, and in the afternoon the business meeting will be held. On the programme is the presentation of a valuable report on Public Questions, for which we hope to find space next week. Further particulars will be found advertised in another column. We are asked to say that at luncheon a vegetarian table will be provided, and that visitors wishing to avail themselves of it are requested to send their names at once to Miss Amy Withall, 15, Highbury New Park, N.

"MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS" was the subject of a paper read last Monday by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, at a special meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission Committee, called by the President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, at the Memorial Hall. The subject is of such vital interest to our churches as a whole, that we have asked to be allowed to publish Mr. Barrow's paper, and hope to arrange a symposium upon it, to be continued from week to week. For the paper itself we hope to find room next week.

IN this month's Mill Hill Chapel Record the Rev. Charles Hargrove tells of the visit he is to pay next year to our Churches in Australia and New Zealand, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The committee had hoped that their late President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, would be able to undertake this mission, and friends at the Antipodes were looking eagerly for his visit; but reasons of health have compelled him reluctantly to decline the invitation, and the committee are greatly indebted to Mr. Hargrove for taking up the work. The Mill Hill congregation have consented to set their minister free, and he is to leave home soon after Easter, to be absent about seven months. There is a great opportunity for a strong lecturer both to quicken the zeal of the existing churches and to appeal to a wider public in the chief cities of Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand, and the good wishes of all friends at home will go with Mr. Hargrove for abundant success in his mission, in the fulfilment of which, we understand, he is to circle the globe.

THE Baptist Union has been meeting at Derby this week, the address of the President, Mr. George White, M.P., dealing with "The Nonconformist Conscience in its Relation to Child Life." Subsequently the following resolution, moved by the Rev. J. G. Greenhough, was unanimously passed:—

That this assembly expresses its indignation at the long-continued misgovernment of Macedonia in spite of repeated promises of reform, and its horror at the recent cruelties, massacres, and terrible outrages, especially upon defenceless women and innocent children. It is convinced that there can be no final settlement without the emancipation of these oppressed provinces from Turkish rule. It therefore calls upon the British Government, which by its former intervention has a peculiar responsibility in this matter, to intervene effectively as the champion of the victims of this inhuman treatment, and to make the continuance of diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Turkey dependent upon the concession of duly guaranteed protection of life, freedom, and property under a Christian Governor to these oppressed and greatly injured subjects of the Sultan.

THE six weeks of the Friends' Summer School at Woodbrook, near Birmingham, as to which we have already noted the part taken by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, during the first fortnight, appear to have been amply enjoyed by successive parties of students to the end. Among the lecturers in the last fortnight was Dr. Edwin D. Starbuck, Professor of Education in Stanford University, California, who has come over to spend his sabbatical year on the Continent. Professor Starbuck's work on the "Psychology of Religion" was reviewed in THE INQUIRER of May 5, 1900.

THE Woodbrooke Permanent Settlement is to be opened on Oct. 13, when Dr. J. Rendel Harris, having declined the Leiden Professorship which was offered him, is to take up his position as Director of Studies, residing close at hand. For the first term we learn from a circular announcement that Joshua and Isabella A. Rowntree are to act as wardens. "It is earnestly desired that an enrichment of the soul, an increase of spiritual power, and ability for service, may be the first fruits of the Settlement." While preference will be given to those coming for longer periods, students will be received for shorter visits, from a week upwards; and while the Settlement is established distinctly for Friends, if accommodation permits it will be open to others, who are in general sympathy with the aims and purposes of the Settlement as conducted by Friends. The local secretary is Mr. J. H. Barlow, Selly Oak, near Birmingham.

THE London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting of the Society of Friends has organised what promises to be an exceedingly interesting and helpful series of lectures on "The Problem of Poverty." The lectures are to be given on alternate Monday evenings at Devonshire House, beginning at 6.30 (to be preceded by tea at 6 o'clock). The first lecture is to be given on Oct. 12, by Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, one of the contributors to the volume "The Heart of the Empire," his subject being introductory to the whole course, on "The Problem of Poverty." On Oct. 26, Mr. Will Crooks, M.P., is to lecture on "How the Poor Live." The other lectures are:—Nov. 9, Mr. E. J. Urwick, of Toynbee Hall, "What the Individual can Do"; Nov. 23, Mr. Sidney Webb, "What London can Do in the Way of Education"; Dec. 7, Mr. John Burns, M.P., "The Work of the Municipality."

CITIZEN SUNDAY is to be observed in the Manchester district. A number of the clergy and ministers of the neighbourhood have decided to adopt the custom, now firmly established in London, of observing one Sunday in the autumn as "an occasion for urging upon congregations their civic duties toward the community, and to call attention to their opportunities of working with the representative authorities for the improvement of the condition of the people." At a meeting held in the Lord Mayor's parlour on the initiative of the Citizens' Association, an independent executive committee of clergy and ministers was appointed to organise the movement. The second Sunday in October was suggested as the suitable date each year.

THE circular convening the meeting made reference to the serious obstacles that are placed in the way of religious work through the insanitary conditions and the generally depressing influences of the crowded areas in large cities. It said further: "We believe that greater willingness on the part of capable religious men and women to give their service to the public or on elected bodies, and a more earnest religious sense of the obligations of citizenship in choosing representatives at the poll, in watching the action of public bodies, and in giving intelligent help in furtherance of their work when it is on right lines, would be of untold benefit to the happiness and godliness of the community."

IN the October number of Sermons for the Day, under the title "A Religious Congress at Amsterdam," the Rev. R. A. Armstrong gathers up his impressions of the meetings of the International Council. It was, he says, pre-eminently a religious experience, amid all the noble interests of the country and the delightful hospitality of its people. Yet he rightly records the one impression of something lacking which many of us received. It is stated in the following passage:—

But even the best and brightest qualities always carry with them their own complementary defects; and I think that few of us English passed through the sessions without now and again dimly feeling that there was something lacking. At all such gatherings we in England are accustomed to sound the keynote very frequently by intervals of simple united worship. Here in Liverpool at our National Triennial Conference we had many such opportunities, and the last session ended on a note of the loftiest spiritual expression. In London, two years ago, the International Council itself marked its deeper purpose and significance by like opportunities of united prayer and praise. At Amsterdam there was but one stated religious service, and only once, at the very end, was the voice of united praise heard in the hall of general assembly; and when after that hymn we all waited for and expected the utterance of a final benediction, it was with a painful shock that we found our expectation met only by the sharp tap of the President's hammer on the table which proclaimed the second International Congress of Free Religion at an end.

Perhaps this absence of devotional expression was due to the simple difficulties of language; perhaps to the large proportion of professorial members; perhaps to the genius of the free religious movement in the Netherlands. But to whatever it is to be ascribed, the lack was there, and was distinctly felt by many worshipful souls in that multitudinous concourse.

On the other hand, it is to be most gratefully proclaimed that, where purely religious feeling did get the opportunity of expression, it was strong and most uplifting.

And then Mr. Armstrong goes on to describe the profoundly religious impression of the service in the Old Walloon Church, and the sermon by Mr. Van Loenen Martinet, with which he couples Dr. Oort's Presidential address, as the other chief religious utterance of the week.

AFTER telling of the President's address and his final word of delight in the fellowship of the International gathering, Mr. Armstrong concluded his sermon by accepting that as the final impression of the whole Congress:—"The little one has become a thousand, the small one a strong nation. We are not a handful only, not a forlorn hope, but an army of the Lord in serried phalanx over the face of the earth. We are many. We are strong. Call us what you will—Unitarians, Liberal Christians, Free Religious Thinkers—we who bow to no external revelation, but only to the Holy Presence which has its inmost shrine in the inmost heart of man. We are many. We are strong. Be of good cheer, ye preachers, ye Sunday-school Teachers, ye Postal Missioners, all ye who speak and strive and pray for the day when the heart of man shall everywhere be free to know its joy, and realise the hallowed outline of the everlasting temple built by no human hands. Be of good cheer. Ye are many. Ye are strong; and, so ye be faithful, the Lord your God shall be your rereward, your shield and defence in the stress of battle, your strength and joy in the day of the victory that is to be."

THE October Seed Sower contains the first of a series of "Travel Impressions" by the editor, the Rev. Joseph Wood, who is now in America. First he tells of a Sunday at sea, and then of Boston, as to which we will quote one passage:—

Boston is a combination of the old-fashioned New England town, with its narrow, crooked streets, quaint wooden buildings and traditions of early settlers, and the modern, up-to-date city, with its broad boulevards, palatial houses, electric trams on every road, and the electric light in every house. Moreover, it boasts that in proportion to its population it is the wealthiest city in the world. It is a better cause of boasting that its wealth is more widely distributed among the people than in any other American city. The signs of wealth are abundant, and in nothing more striking than in the evident well-to-do-ness of the working folk. Its public buildings, State House, offices, colleges, schools, shops, are on the most lavish scale. Take its Free Library only—erected at a cost of nearly half a million sterling—not dollars—decorated by Abby, Sargeant, and other artists with splendid frescoes, its shelves loaded with a million books, its news-room, where you can consult a thousand newspapers from all over the world, and a reading-room second only to that of the British Museum. Of course the question was asked, "What do you think of Boston?" and we could only answer, like the Queen of Sheba when she saw all the glory of Solomon, "There is no breath left in us!"

FROM last week's issue of the Christian World, it appears that the influence of the higher criticism on missionary work is again troubling the mind of the orthodox. Our contemporary thinks that the effect of the newer knowledge of the Bible should make the missionaries' task an easier one. It certainly makes it a more complicated one, and it may be that the Missionary Societies are wise in not seeking for their agents men who are marked by advanced thought. It is an interesting speculation how far a change of views on the authority of the Bible will prove to be compatible in the long run with strong missionary zeal. But if this form of Christian heroism should be doomed to flag what shall take its place? What health can there be in a church that is not full of energy in its desire to spell out the message of God to man? Some other channel for the enthusiasm of humanity and the passion of self-sacrifice must then be found.

IN his opening address to the students of Headingley (Wesleyan) College, the Rev. W. J. Moulton, M.A., recently a student of the same college, uttered a strong plea for hard work and accurate study. "It is a shame upon us if those who are far away from our faith know more of the Scriptures than we do. We must meet them, not by sermons on the wickedness of criticism, but by the careful exposition of what can be found nowhere but in the Bible." In another passage of the address, this significant warning was given:—

Men have gone out from houses like this, men of fluent tongue and almost vacant mind, men who wasted the hours given to them by the Church which accepted their declaration that they were called of God to the work of the ministry. They have gone out to come near to losing their own souls and the souls committed to their charge. But if we are to retain our first love, are to be made fit to cope with the problems of to-day, our minds must be stored with fresh thoughts, our wills bent to the acquiring of fresh knowledge, our whole being must be strenuous, alert, eager. Real self-denying study, for those whose duty it is to study, will constantly enrich their own experience of Divine things.

THE September number of the Expositor contains an article by the Rev. J. Hoatson, M.A., on "James Martineau and Frederick Robertson: A Study of Influence." Mr. Stopford Brooke pointed out in his Life of Robertson how highly he had valued Martineau's Endeavours after the Christian Life, and this theme is worked out by Mr. Hoatson in most interesting detail. "With a mind of his order," he says of Robertson, "it was inevitable that acquaintance with and use of sermons like Martineau's should go hand in hand. He had not only a sensitive and sympathetic temperament, but also a wonderfully retentive memory. Books read became a part of himself. Unconsciously ideas, absorbed long before, were reproduced, sometimes with but slight alteration in their setting. Possessed, moreover, of a rare poetic spirit, a deep love for Nature, and a keen insight into her beauty and meaning, coupled with devotional fervour and spiritual vision, he was irresistibly drawn by a preacher of like characteristics. Further, his revolt from Evangelicalism led him to a position identical in one important respect with Martineau's. Both loved to 'linger near the common springs of all human piety and hope'; and to Robertson the beautiful thoughts, which stud every page of the Endeavours, would be veritable wells of consolation in his own needs and fountains of inspiration in his work of satisfying the needs of others."

ROBERTSON'S use of Martineau's sermons Mr. Hoatson regards as affording a valuable object lesson to preachers on how to borrow from another without being a plagiarist. Robertson, he says, "does not read in order to borrow, but borrows because he has read and assimilated." Then follow instances from Robertson's sermons, sometimes with passages printed in parallel columns, to show how intimate was the relation of many passages of Robertson's sermons with those in the two volumes of the Endeavours, published in 1843 and 1847. And Mr. Hoatson adds:—

What Dr. Martineau's influence on the world at large may have been we cannot tell. I venture to assert that no preacher and teacher of the past century did more to inspire the modern pulpit, and, through that, the thought of the Church as a whole. Of preachers influenced by him, none has moved Christendom more than Robertson. With the exception of Beecher's and Spurgeon's, no sermons have been more widely and appreciatively read than his. Facts like these suggest the vast direct and indirect influence of the Endeavours. How far that work affected Robertson's ministry I have tried to show. Doubtless Dr. Martineau long since noticed the fact. To him it must have been the source of joy that so fine a mind, so eloquent a preacher, so beautiful a spirit, learnt so much from himself.

THE "Christian Social Brotherhood" is a society formed with aims somewhat similar to those of the better known "Christian Social Union," but without the Anglican doctrines that distinguish the latter. It includes in its membership both men and women, ministers and lay people. In practice these belong in the main to the Free Churches of various denominations, of which the Unitarian is one. The idea of the Society is expressed in its object thus:—

(1) To secure the fuller recognition of the Kingdom of God by the practical application of the doctrine of human solidarity to the facts of industrial and social life.

(2) To emphasise the duty of studying—

(a) The extent, nature, and cause of poverty.

(b) The moral and spiritual effects of success and failure in individual competition for private profit.

(c) The remedies for our present social disunion, economic, social, and national.

(3) To press these questions on the thought of the churches, in the conviction that there can be no regeneration of humanity without a deeper recognition of the relation of universal brotherhood implied in Christian discipleship and a reconstruction of our social system.

The society consists of a central body and of local branches. The meetings of the former are usually held on the third Thursday in the month, at Dr. Williams' library, and serve as an opportunity for intercourse for those who think that far-reaching reforms are needed, but who also think that these cannot be really successful where there is not the motive force of religious principle. Membership is open to all who accept the object of the society. Full information can be obtained from the hon. secretary, W. Reason, M.A., Macdonald-road, New Southgate, N.

WITH reference to the appointment of the Rev. W. A. Curtis, B.D., to the chair of Systematic Theology in the University of Aberdeen, the Rev. C. C. Macdonald, paying the Professor a Presbyterial compliment, said, "The treatises he submitted to the commissioners bore no trace of Germanism. Professor Curtis had evidently maintained his Scottish intellectual characteristics, and that was one of the most signal proofs of the strength of his mind." The Professor is only twenty-seven years of age, and he may travel.

LITERATURE.

THE JEWISH ENCYCLOPÆDIA.*

THE general scope and character of the "Jewish Encyclopædia" are already well known, at all events to those who are interested in Judaism. The present volume is quite up to the high standard of the three which have preceded it. And if the whole work is completed on the same scale, both of quality and quantity, its promoters will have every reason to be proud of their achievement.

To review an encyclopædia is always difficult, owing to the variety of interesting topics which seem to call for notice. I will mention a few of the most important articles, and then confine myself to one for more extended notice. I name the following articles as noteworthy:—"Church Fathers," "Chess," "Chronology," "Circumcision," "Clean and Unclean Animals," "Commerce," "Cookery" (Christian housewives ought certainly to study this, "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest"), "Costume," "Creation," "Diaspora" "Didache," "Dietary Laws," and last but not least "Dreyfus." The most important article in the volume, at least the one of greatest interest to the Christian reader, quâ Christian, is that on Christianity, by Dr. Kohler, of New York; and of this I will endeavour to give some account.

Christianity [says Dr. Kohler] is the system of religious truths based upon the belief that Jesus of Nazareth was the expected Messiah or Christ. . . . It furthermore claims that Jesus, its Christ, was and is a son of God in a higher and essentially different sense than any other human being, sharing in His divine nature, a cosmic principle destined to counteract the principle of evil embodied in Satan; that therefore the death of the crucified Christ was designed by God to be the means of atonement for the sin inherited by the human race through the fall of Adam; and, consequently, that without belief in Jesus, in whom the Old Testament sacrifice is typified, there is no salvation. Finally, Christianity, as a world-power, claims that it represents the highest form of civilisation.

These three claims indicate the main divisions of the whole article, of which the first deals with the Messianic movement, the second with the Deity of Christ and the institution of the Church, and the third with the historic mission of Christianity. Separate articles, in succeeding volumes, will be devoted to "Polemics," "New Testament Literature," and the personality of Jesus.

Under the head of the Messianic movement the author draws attention to the fact that the rise of Christianity made extremely little impression upon contemporary Judaism. There is no word in the Rabbinical literature which exclusively denotes Christianity. There is a word "Minūth," which denotes heresy, but it has no original reference to Christianity, and only in one or two passages are "Nazarenes" (Nōtzrim) mentioned by name. It is certainly true, as the author states, that "there is no indication in Jewish literature that the appearance of Jesus, either as a teacher or as a social or political leader, made at the time a deep or lasting impression on the Jewish people in general. Outside of Galilee he was scarcely known." The author holds that the "main impulse to the Christian movement was given by John the Baptist—an Essene saint, who . . . stood forth as the preacher of 'repentance' and 'good tidings,' . . . in expectation of the Messianic kingdom." Jesus only took up the message of John, after the latter had been imprisoned by Herod, and Dr. Kohler suggests that in the popular estimation John was the greater man of the two. He admits that Jesus deviated from the practice of the Essenes and Pharisees in not shunning contact with sinners, and says that "he truly became the redeemer of the lower classes, who were not slow to lift him to the station of the Messiah." That Jesus himself ever claimed to be the Messiah is considered to be doubtful, partly on the ground that "the entire code of ethics in the sermon on the mount is not a law of conduct for a world rejoicing in a redeemer that has come, but a guide for a few of the elect and saintly ones who wait for the immediate downfall of this world and the rise of another." On this view, Jesus did not found Christianity or organise the Church, but was simply a humble teacher, disclaiming all honour and glory for himself, and with no thought of any but the few friends to whom he imparted his doctrine.

But upon these friends he made a deep impression, and Dr. Kohler assigns to "the great personality of Jesus which had so impressed the simple people of Galilee," a large share in ensuring that the Christian movement did not come to an end with his death. The deep impression produced upon his followers, together with their "transcendentalism or other worldliness," created in them the belief in the risen Christ, so that he became a living power after his death. And in that atmosphere of unquestioning faith there grew up a sort of Messianic midrash in which the story of his life was adorned with marvels, beginning with the virgin birth and ending with the Resurrection. This midrash is now to be found in the Synoptic Gospels. A good deal of what is there contained, even of what is ascribed to Jesus, is drawn from Jewish sources. "What Jesus actually said is difficult to determine. Many of his teachings can be traced back to rabbinical sayings current in the Pharisaic schools; and many sentences, if not entire chapters, have been taken over from Essene writings." (I may remind the reader that I am only sketching Dr. Kohler's theory, not criticising it.) "On the other hand," he says, "there are utterances of striking originality and wondrous power which denote great genius. . . . And whether or not the whole life picture is reality or poetic imagination, in him the Essene ideal reached its culmination."

Probably few, if any, Christian readers would regard this as an adequate or accurate estimate of the historical position of Jesus, though from a Jew it is natural enough. But the author is on safer ground when he maintains that "it is not correct to speak, as Christian theologians do, of a possible recognition or an actual rejection of the Christship of Jesus by the Jews. Whatever his greatness as teacher or as friend of the people, this could not establish his claim to the Messianic title." To which it might be added that no means existed by which any such recognition or rejection could become the collective act of the Jews as a nation, whatever individuals may have thought about him. "His blood be upon us and upon our children" is only rhetoric, even if it were really said.

In the second main division of his article Dr. Kohler sketches the rise and growth of the Church, and finds in Paul the real founder of it. And it is only natural that towards Paul he should be much less sympathetic than towards Jesus.

[Paul] "construed the belief in the atoning death of Christ, held by the rest, into a system altogether antagonistic to Judaism and its law. Operating with certain Gnostic ideas, which rendered the Messiah, as son of God, a cosmic power like Philo's Logos . . . . he saw both in the Crucifixion and the Incarnation acts of divine self-humiliation suffered for the sake of redeeming a world polluted and doomed by sin since the fall of Adam. . . . On the other hand, Paul taught that the law of Moses . . . . failed to redeem man because it made sin unavoidable. By a course of reasoning he discarded the law, as being under the curse, and declared only those who believed in Christ as the son of God to be free from all bondage. . . . He claimed God to be the God of the heathen as well as of the Jews. Yet in enunciating this seemingly liberal doctrine, he deprived faith, as typified by Abraham, of its naturalness, and forged the shackles of the Christian dogma, with its terrors of damnation and hell for the unbeliever. God, as Father and just Ruler, was pushed into the background, and the Christ . . . . was rendered the central figure because he, as head and glory of the divine kingdom, has to combat Satan and his kingdom of evil, sin and death. While thus opening wide the door to admit the pagan world, Paul caused the influx of the entire pagan mythology, in the guise of Gnostic and anti-Gnostic names and formulas."

From this point onwards the development of the Church was on lines which continually diverged more widely from Judaism, and ended in complete antagonism.

Dr. Kohler briefly notices the doctrine of the Trinity, the worship of the Virgin, the use of images, the doctrine of the Mediatorship of Christ, and the doctrine of original sin, as marking points of extreme opposition between Judaism and the Catholic Church. And while he notes how, under the sway of the latter, faith was exalted above reason, producing "a credulity throughout Christendom which became indifferent to the laws of Nature, and depreciated learning," he claims that "it was the Mohammedan and the Jew who kept the lamps of knowledge and science burning; and to them, in large measure, the revival of learning through scholastic philosophy in the Catholic cloisters, and afterwards in Western Europe, is largely due." The great Christian teachers had no good to say of Jews. But the great Jewish theologians were not deterred by persecution or prejudice from calmly examining the Christian system of theology, and did not hesitate to ascribe to Christianity and Islam a high providential mission in history.

What this was is discussed in the third division of the article, where Dr. Kohler says: "To offer to the great Gentile world the Jewish truth adapted to its psychic and intellectual capacities—this was the providential mission of Christianity. . . : It was, after all, the glad tidings of the Jew, Jesus, which won humanity for Abraham's God." And further, he says: "Christianity is not an end but the means to an end; namely, the establishment of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. Here Christianity presents itself as an orb of light, but not so central as to exclude Islam nor so bright and unique as to eclipse Judaism, the parent of both."

The foregoing is only a brief sketch of a deeply interesting study of Christianity from the outside. To criticise it would need a volume; and after all what matters most is not to convict the author of error but to study the impression made by Christianity upon a learned and broad-minded Jew. He writes with no trace of theological hatred, with no desire either to flatter or to compromise. And if the Christian reader feels that the picture given of Christianity is in many respects incomplete and out of drawing, he must remember that no Jew can fairly be expected to see Christianity with the eyes of a Christian. The lesson will not have been useless which teaches the Christian that however much he may prize his own religion, there are yet other ways in which the religious nature of man can represent its relation to God, and find the means of communion with Him. Judaism is one of them; and, not as the protest of a "stiff-necked people" against Christianity, but in its own right as an ancient and noble religion Judaism still exists, to fulfil, along with Christianity, a divine purpose, and take its share in revealing God to man.

THE INDEPENDENT REVIEW.*

ANOTHER serious monthly review must have very strong reasons to justify its appearance among the stalwarts that already hold the field, and to furnish any hope of permanent success. For the new Independent we trust that such courage will prove to have been justified, for with sobriety of judgment and earnestness of purpose it takes up the position of a reformer, with faith in a better future for the people of this country. Mr. Edward Jenks, formerly Professor of Law in University College, Liverpool, and now of Balliol College, Oxford, is editor, and on the editorial council are Messrs. G. Lowes Dickinson, C. F. G. Masterman, and G. M. Trevelyan, three of the contributors to the volume of essays, "The Heart of the Empire."

The number opens with an editorial "Plea for a Programme," asking of the Liberal chiefs a strong lead, and in the meanwhile pointing out what the most pressing needs of the country really are. Education, temperance, and a juster system of taxation especially of ground values, occupy a prominent place, and the article closes with a foreshadowing of the true imperial ideal, which must be maintained against those who, "seeking to compass a premature union by violence, would substitute a sordid and treacherous for a sure and spiritual bond, and would degrade and brutalise the part our race should play in the world's history."

Canon Barnett follows with a wise article on "Social Reform," and after two "Preference" and "Protection" articles, damning to the new crusade, Mr. Birrell has a characteristic plea for "An Educational Concordat," which is to keep all the schools of the people for secular education during the ordinary hours, and let in the religious teachers that are asked for at the end of the day.

Mr. Bryce's weighty article on "The Near East" we noted last week. There are also two ecclesiastical articles by Dr. Sanday and Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, to which we hope to return. One of the most striking things in the Review is Professor Mommsen's "Appeal to the English" for a better understanding with the German people; for "still I hold the creed," he concludes, "that German and Englishman are destined to go forward hand in hand."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE hurly-burly of the Fiscal controversy cannot be escaped. Notable are the contributions in the Monthly Review by Sir Edward Grey and Lord Hugh Cecil, and in the Contemporary by Mr. J. S. Mann on "Mr. Balfour and Economic Fact," and Mr. Mark Warren on "The Trade of the Empire." In other Reviews no less abundant material for considerae tion may be found; but we must hop that the prominence given to this subject will not lead to the neglect of other vital questions. The Macedonian horror is indeed, too insistent to escape attention, and the conscience of this country has at last been deeply stirred. We commend to the attention of our readers the ominous notes on this subject by Dr. Dillon in the Contemporary. What we particularly hope will not be overlooked is the weighty article on "The Amendment of the Education Act," by Sir G. W. Kekewich, which holds the place of honour in the Contemporary. As regards elementary Education, the Act of 1902, he declares, cannot stand.

Far from being a settlement, it is so nakedly unjust, it has so intensified the religious difficulty, and so deeply stirred religious feeling that it is certain that it must either be repealed or subjected to drastic amendment before educational peace can be re-established. It is bitterly opposed by Nonconformists, it has not even found entire favour with the rank and file of the Anglican clergy. Some regard themselves as betrayed by their bishops and Convocation; some resent the injustice inflicted on their fellow-Protestants, and regret the religious unrest which they rightly consider to conflict with the interests of the Established Church.

Sir George does not advocate repeal of the Act, but effectual amendment, particularly for the removal of the religious difficulty, and to secure that all schools shall be under genuine popular control. He does not believe that the bulk of Churchmen, and especially of the parents, are anxious for that kind of religious teaching on which bishops and clergy so strenuously insist, and holds that they prefer "Board School religion," which in large towns in the past has generally reached a higher standard than the teaching of the Church schools. He sets his hope therefore on strictly undenominational religious teaching, rather than its entire banishment in school hours. As to London, he holds that the Act of 1903 ought to go. "The School Board for London, the abolition of which was confessedly the main object of the Act, has perished, not because it was inefficient, but because it did its duty too thoroughly and too well. . . . It did a greater work in a shorter time than has ever been accomplished by any educational authority in the world. Its virtues, and not its defects, have led to its downfall." It must therefore, Sir George concludes, be the model for a future separate authority for London, which shall unite the duties and powers of the Technical Education Board of the County Council with those of the present School Board. On the point of religious teaching Mr. Augustine Birrell's article in the Independent should be read with this, and also Dr. Guinness Rogers on "The Nonconformist Uprising" in the Nineteenth Century and After. There also will be found an article by Mr. Sidney Webb on "London Education," and another by Mr. J. A. Hobson on "The Negro Problem in the United States." Those who are curious in such matters should turn to Mr. E. Wake Cook's article in the Contemporary on "The Truth about Christian Science."

In the Monthly Review the illustrated article is by Basil de Sélincourt: "A Critical Study of the Scenes from the Life of Christ in the North Transept of the Lower Church at Assisi."

The World's Work has fine portraits of Gladstone and John Morley, and an article by Mr. Augustine Birrell in anticipation of Morley's "Life of Gladstone." The "Day's Work" article, fully illustrated, is descriptive of Messrs, W. H. Smith and Son—"the great Distributors of Literature."

BAND OF HOPE NEEDS.

AT the recent conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union at Portsmouth, a new feature was introduced in the reading of "postcard" replies to the question, "What is the present greatest need of the Band of Hope movement?" Here is one of them:—The greatest need of the Band of Hope movement seems to me to be persistent and consecutive teaching. It is to be met by persuading workers to make themselves more efficient for this duty, by using the best means placed at their disposal by the U.K. Union, and similar organisations. The teachers should teach a little well, rather than much inefficiently. The more thoroughly they master the principles upon which Total Abstinence is based, the more effectively will they teach the children. A little accurate knowledge well drilled into the minds of the young, by carefully arranged questions, will not only interest the restless ones, but will stick in the minds of all. Such teaching will help to lead the taught, not to Nelson's old flagship in the harbour, but to the real "Victory" for which we are working. England expects all Band of Hope workers to do their duty.

HOME PAGES: A NEW SERIES.

To some of our readers "Home Pages" will be unknown, but to many others the title will recall happy memories of old times. Forty years ago Brooke Herford was still minister of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, though he removed in the following year to Manchester. Since September, 1860, he had been editing "Home Pages," a series of popular tracts, issuing, it would seem, about thirty every year, for when the publication ceased in September, 1867, there were 236 tracts in all.

They were, for the most part, what the general title implied, homely talks, intended for humble folk and thoughtful working men, in those days of hopeful and ardent Unitarian zeal, which was confident that, given an effective ministry, the religious future of the working classes was in our fellowship. Brooke Herford was demonstrating in his own ministry how well-grounded was such a hope, and "Home Pages" aimed at taking a quiet friendly share in the work. In many homes they were thankfully welcomed, and to many teachers, especially in Northern Sunday-schools, and to visitors among the people, it will be known how admirably they fulfilled their purpose.

There was a great variety of subject in the "Home Pages." Some were simple statements of Unitarian doctrine, with or without a bit of story to drive the lesson home, others were of practical religion or stories of everyday life, others again told of heroic incidents in religious history. A large number of the tracts were by the editor himself, coming straight out of the heart of his active ministry, and while a good many especially of the stories, were anonymous, the name of Beatrice A. Jordan will be gratefully remembered in that connection, and among those who contributed doctrinal tracts were John Wright, Russell Carpenter, T. E. Poynting, P. W. Clayden, and J. Page Hopps. Robert Collyer's "Holiness of Helpfulness" and "Tender, Trusty, and True," also appeared in the series.

Brooke Herford's contributions were as varied as his own wide sympathies. There were plain doctrinal talks, such as "Christianity as Christ preached it," "A Commonsense View of the Bible," "Saved, yet so as by Fire," and "Think for Yourself;" there was a remarkable series of "Parables from Common Work," using the different processes of the Sheffield staple industry to teach lessons of practical religious life, and many other practical talks, such as "Woman's Work and Care," "Thankfulness," "Try Kindness," "Be Patient and True with Children," and stories like "The Seven Poor Men of Jan Meyen." Then also he told the "Story of the Sheffield Flood," and included two of the bravest sermons he ever preached, one from his Sheffield ministry, "A Trade Outrage, and a few plain words about it," the other from Manchester, "Sergeant Brett's Keys."

We recall these memories now because they add to the pleasure and satisfaction with which we welcome a new series of "Home Pages," of which the first six numbers have just been published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; and it is a happy circumstance that while we trust that Dr. Herford will be able to take some pleasure in this renewal of a work, which in the old days was very near to his heart, his eldest daughter, Miss Helen Brooke Herford, is the editor of the new series.

Some such "Pages" as these have often been asked for of recent years by visitors among the poor, who have so many opportunities of offering a helpful word, and "something good to read" to humble folk. The new "Home Pages," with the greater facilities of to-day and the ampler resources of the Association, are issued in admirable form, with nothing of the forbidding tract about them. They may lie on the drawing-room table unabashed, and the men in cottage homes need not be ashamed to see them passed from hand to hand. And as to contents, judging from these first six numbers, they are to be true to their name, simple, pleasant home talks, about the real things of life and its religion.

The first, a most welcome tribute to the old "Home Pages," is a reprint of the original No. 12, "Woman's Work and Care," in which Brooke Herford told the story of Martha and Mary, and with the wise sympathy of one who knew, brought its lessons home to over-burdened mothers and others who had "much serving" to do. Two others, "Patchwork," and "In Honour Preferring One Another" are new publications from the same pen; and the other three are "Jem Cooper's Geraniums," by E. Baumer Williams; "A Bit On," some wise words about the evils of gambling, by the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst; and "A Preacher's Message," in which Miss F. E. Cooke once more tells of Channing. There is here nothing of controversial theology, only homely heart-felt religious teaching and helpful human sympathy; but if any readers ask what are the denominational connections of these "Home Pages," they find an answer in two declarations printed on the inside of every cover. In the first, the Rev. J. T. Sunderland answers the question "What is Unitarianism?" as follows:—

It is Christianity in the light of the Twentieth Century. It is the religion of reason and the human heart. It is the religion of the Lord's Prayer, the Golden Rule, and the two great commands of love to God and man. It stands for deeds, not dogmas; for freedom of thought and progress, not for bondage to the past. It teaches that the truest service of God is service of humanity.

The second is a brief manifesto by the publishing Association:—

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association is a working missionary organisation. It seeks to promote sympathy and united action among liberal religious thinkers and workers, and to spread the principles which are believed by Unitarians to be essential to civil and religious liberty and progress, and to the attainment of the spiritual life. To this end it supports ministers, helps to establish and maintain churches, holds conferences and meetings, publishes books, sermons, essays, tracts, hymnals, and devotional works.

We are not sure that for the special purpose of "Home Pages" the inside of the covers would not have been better plain, but there the declarations are, and they will doubtless be useful to inquiring minds.

Once more we bid the heartiest welcome to the new "Home Pages," and trust that those who know the value of the old series will see to it that this new issue is made widely known and used, as it well deserves.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE new session was opened on Wednesday afternoon at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, when Col. Pilcher presided, and the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., delivered an address on "Modern Assyriology and the Old Testament." There was a good attendance.

In the course of his address Mr. Manning said: Babylon and Nineveh, splendid in their power, picturesque in their decay, have left an indelible mark in the history of the world. Babylon gave Western Asia its earliest civilisation. From Babylon Assyria borrowed its culture, its religion, its arts, and its sciences. Then Assyria gained supremacy over its mother and teacher, and for several centuries held a dominant place in the history of the empire. But Nineveh fell (606 B.C.). Babylon once more rose to supremacy, and under Nebuchadnezzar became one of the wonders of the ancient world. But Assyria had left its mark, by its conquests and its tyranny; so that long after its fall the Greek historians called the land of the Euphrates and Tigris, including Babylonia itself, Assyria; and to-day the study of the monuments of both Assyria and Babylonia is called Assyriology.

Dr. Friedrich Delitzsch, the distinguished Assyriologist, calls his now famous lecture "Babel und Bibel." Under this title he deals with the influence both of Babylonia and Assyria on the life, literature, and history of the Hebrews. It has been read far and wide. Some of its critics, however, raise the cry that the facts Delitzsch mentions are destructive, and that the Bible is no longer safe in the hands of the Assyriologist. The cry against Delitzsch is confined practically to his own country. In England and America his book has met with a hearty reception. Perhaps his offence is in his out-spoken opinions about revelation, which are unquestionably opposed to orthodox notions. Mr. Manning thought Delitzsch quite mistaken in his attack on the "Old Israelitish Oracles," "to which," he says, "either from ignorance, indifference, or infatuation, we ascribe a 'revealed' character which cannot be maintained, either in the light of science or in that of religion or ethics. The more deeply I immerse myself in the spirit of the prophetic literature of the Old Testament, the greater becomes my distrust of Jahve, who butchers the peoples with the sword of his irresistible anger; who has but one favourite child, while he consigns all other nations to darkness, shame, and ruin; who uttered those words to Abraham: 'I will bless those who bless thee, and those who curse thee will I curse.'"

Delitzsch's lecture is remarkable in his claim to have discovered the name "Jhvh" in three clay tablets of the age of Hammurabi (c. 2285 B.C.). If this claim proves valid it will establish his contention that Jhvh "was the spiritual possession of those same nomad tribes out of which after 1,000 years the children of Israel were to emerge." He further claims to have established the fact that, in spite of the boundless polytheism of Babylonia, there was growing up, among the thoughtful at least, a monotheism. "Babylon as the interpreter and illustrator of the Bible" is the meaning of the title Delitzsch puts to his lecture. Of the proneness of the Israelites to imitate Babylon we have an illustration in the temple of Solomon. The temple of Bel in Babylon had inner and outer courts, a "holy of holies" separated from the main part of the temple by a curtain or "veil." In this was an image of the god, before which stood the table of showbread; and so on. Assyriology has a value in explaining etymological obscurities, confirms the history of the Bible, and corrects the Bible and also false impressions of the Bible. Mr. Manning gave a number of illustrations in proof of these facts.

The more the monuments are studied the clearer are the evidences of the immense influence of Babylon and Assyria on the life of the Hebrews. It affected their history, their religion, and their social economy. The Assyrians were essentially a warlike nation, "a fierce people," as Isaiah (xxxiii. 19) calls them. The Babylonians were essentially commercial and industrial. Evidences of the magnitude of the trade of Babylon may be seen in the contract tablets that have of late been discovered.

The immense superiority of the Bible as a religious book over the books of Babylonia must be clear to every unprejudiced reader. The Hebrews, however, borrowed much from both Babylonians and Assyrians. They borrowed myths, for example, the Story of the Creation and the Story of the Flood. So far as the Hebrews borrowed from the religion of Babylon and Nineveh it degraded them. It did not harmonise with their natural tone of thought. Their true genius was ethical and religious; it found its natural affinities in a spiritual monotheism; and this genius asserted itself in the repeated revulsion from idolatry to the worship of Jhvh. It is seen in the moral and religious treatment of the legends of the nation, and of the lessons deduced from its history. It is seen in the spiritual earnestness and depth of the psalms and prophetic writings. As a religious book the Bible is incomparably superior to anything Babylon ever produced; and so far as the religion of the world to-day is strong, helpful, and inspiring, it owes far more to the Bible than to anything Assyriology has yet divulged.

Finally, Delitzsch had fearlessly maintained what he believed to be the truth, in spite of much adverse criticism. That is the proper attitude of the earnest scholar: "For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth."

At the conclusion of the address, Principal Gordon made the statement as to the course of study which would be pursued during the session, and also the interesting announcement that it was being arranged with the view of helping two of the students who were intending to prepare for the London University degree of B.D.

Correspondents are requested to note that news for insertion the same week should reach the Office by Wednesday if possible, and the earlier the better. Thursday morning is the latest time for receiving news, and it should then be very brief, or it will probably have to wait a week.

BELFAST DOMESTIC MISSION.

DEDICATION SERVICE.

IMPROVEMENTS and alterations of an extensive character having been completed in the Domestic Mission buildings, Stanhope-street, they were re-opened on Saturday evening, October 3, when a short dedication service was held.

During the half-century of its existence, the Mission has been successful in carrying on a great deal of quiet and unostentatious Christian work among the poor, and a spirit of fresh hopefulness and desire for larger activities have marked the celebration of its jubilee year. The old building has been very considerably altered, and the improved structure is much more modern and suited to the needs of the people.

The dedication service was conducted by Revs. Douglas Walmsley, W. H. Drummond, and George J. Slipper, under whose care the work is being carried on at the present time.

In the course of a brief address Rev. W. H. Drummond said they were met there that night to celebrate the fulfilment of a dream, and to dedicate a gift. That Mission, with its fifty years of life behind it, so full of noble and tender labour for the souls of men, had arisen into new youth and loveliness, and that day they inaugurated a new chapter of its history, and sent it forth with the deepest prayers of their heart on its Christian mission. It was a gift in answer to a need. He supposed when they tried to do good one of the first things that struck them was that there were so many people who wanted to be helped out of their ills. The first thing that appealed to the imagination was physical misery, poverty, outward degradation, disease, and all those things they wanted to help and to remove, if they might; and of that work that mission had always tried to do its share. But that was not the need that first of all required to be satisfied, for there was another need—the spiritual need, the need of the soul rather than the body. They sometimes fell into the great mistake of thinking that men did not want religion until they were clothed and fed and comfortable. That was a very easy view of religion, but it was not the inmost thought of the human heart. Had they never gone to a man who had seemed to be stripped of everything that could make life happy, living perhaps in a poor, miserable garret, with nothing of the comforts and pleasures of life which seemed to them so necessary, and as they had talked to him they had found out that what he wanted was not medicine, and not something to pass the time, and not more money, though all these things might be of service to him when he could get them; but what he wanted above everything was to feel that God loved him. Right out of the heart of humanity there spoke that great need of God, that cry. What was the gift they were going to give? It was the gift of the Gospel. It was to do that for which that Mission existed, and it was to that work of speaking the word of life to the souls of men that they dedicated it. That had always been at the heart of the Mission's work; it had always been its central interest. Nothing could compensate for the loss of it. In this they were putting themselves into line with the great missionary instinct of Christendom, for a Christian was a man who was distinguished above all by this—that he felt he must impart to others the grace and the love which had come to his own soul. It was for them to try to make the gift in beauty, in power, in sympathy, in human helpfulness, in redeeming grace, fit to satisfy the need. It was to the soul's inarticulate cry to God, to its unconscious prayers for help, to the world's great and inexhaustible need of Jesus Christ that they brought their gift that day, and asked the God and Father of all to accept, to consecrate, and to bless.

OBITUARY.

MR. A. C. OSLER.

THE public life of Birmingham has suffered a great loss by the unexpected death on Thursday week of Mr. Alfred Clarkson Osler, who, until a few days before he succumbed to an acute attack of pneumonia and pleurisy, had been in his usual health, and was preparing to fight the next election as Liberal candidate for Central Birmingham.

Mr. Osler, who was a son of the late Mr. Clarkson Osler and nephew of Mr. Follett Osler, whose death we recently recorded, was in his fifty-seventh year, and from early manhood had taken a keen interest in political affairs and the welfare of his native city. For many years he was the leader of the Liberal party in Birmingham, and remained true to Mr. Gladstone in the latter years of stress. From 1885 to 1896 he was also a member of the City Council, and in the work of education and charity organisation, for the promotion of art and a rational enjoyment of Sunday, and in other efforts for the well-being of the people, he rendered invaluable services.

Representatives of many public bodies and members of all political parties joined in expressions of profound regret for the loss which Birmingham had sustained, and of heartfelt sympathy with Mrs. Osler in her bereavement. The funeral service on Monday was conducted by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, late minister of the Church of the Messiah, first at the house and afterwards at Witton Cemetery, where there was a very large and representative gathering.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE is announced to give two courses of five lectures each on "The Plays of Shakespeare" during the coming session at University College, under the Stopford Brooke Lectureship Fund. The lectures are given on Thursday evenings at 8 o'clock, in the Botanical Theatre, the first course beginning on Nov. 5 with "A Midsummer Night's Dream." THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.
II.—THE BEATITUDES.

Matthew v. 3–10.

THE Sermon on the Mount opens with eight sentences, each of which begins with the word, "Blessed." They are, therefore, called "Beatitudes," for beatitude means blessedness, and "Beatitudes" are sayings which tell us who are the people who are worthy to be called blessed.

But what is blessedness? And what is it to be blessed? Blessedness is spiritual happiness—happiness in its highest, purest, and most lasting form—and to be blessed is to be supremely and eternally happy. Jesus, then, begins by telling us how to be really and truly good, and so how to be really and truly happy. Each Beatitude gives (1) a secret of goodness, and (2) a promise of happiness.

There are Beatitudes in the Old Testament—the first sentence of the First Psalm is one—and there are other Beatitudes in the New Testament, as, for instance, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation"; and there are more besides these in the teaching of Jesus; but, when we speak of The Beatitudes, we mean these eight first sentences of the Sermon on the Mount. In these great sayings Jesus shows what people are like when God is King in their hearts, and in their lives. The Kingdom of God is then within them, and this is their character, point by point:—

(1) They are poor in spirit. Whether rich or poor in this world's goods, they feel how poor they are spiritually, that is, how much they lack, how wanting they are in goodness. They are humble-minded, and, because they are willing to be ruled, they are able to enter into God's Kingdom; theirs is the kingdom of heaven. See what is said in xviii. 3.

(2) They mourn. No one can be good who does not sometimes mourn. Never to mourn, would mean never to be sorry when we do wrong, and never to be sorry for others when they suffer pain. Jesus says that we ought to be glad, and to take it as a good sign, if we have feeling enough to be made sorrowful—sometimes by our own faults, and sometimes by that which others bear. It is a sign that we are not hard-hearted. There is also, for some of us, the mourning for the dead. It is a proof of our love for them, and it strengthens in us the hope of the life to come. So we are comforted.

(3) They are meek. What meekness is, Jesus explains later on, in verses 39–41. Meekness is readiness to give way under (1) Insult (a blow on the cheek); (2) Injury (the taking of a coat); (3) Oppression (compulsion to go a mile). Not that we are to give way in all cases—far from it. Jesus also was sometimes "moved with indignation"; and he never allowed one virtue to destroy another; nor did he at all mean that people should give way when, for the general good, they ought to make a stand; but he did believe and teach that, when it is only a question of what you feel, and of what you think is due to you, it is better and nobler to give way than to stand on your rights. And the persons who give way, and keep their tempers, do somehow seem to have more influence in the end. In this sense they inherit the earth. Victory is on their side, though, like "heirs," who "inherit," they may have to wait; but peace and love will conquer the world at last.

(4) They hunger and thirst after righteousness. This means that they not only feel that they are wanting in goodness—they want to be good. When you are hungry and thirsty, you feel that you must eat, you must drink; you have a craving for food and drink. If then, Jesus says, you have a longing, an appetite, for goodness, that is a good sign. Goodness would be of no use to you, if you did not want to have it. But if you feel that you must have it, and cannot do without it, all the better; it will come in time, and you will be filled, satisfied.

(5) They are merciful. They are not only sorry for those who suffer; they try to help them, like the Good Samaritan, who "showed mercy" on the fallen man, and went out of his way to show it. They bear, and forbear; give, and forgive. You will not forget that one way of being merciful is to be kind to animals. God's mercy "is over all his works," but very often His mercy has to pass through us before it can reach the lower creatures under our care.

(6) They are pure in heart. Not only in deed, but also in thought, as we shall see later on. Purity of heart has also the meaning of "sincerity," which is the opposite of hypocrisy (vi. 2, 5, 16), and of double-mindedness (vi. 22–24). To see God's truth, and that only, and to be true to it, is to see Him.

(7) They are peacemakers. Not peacemakers by making up other men's quarrels, but makers of peace, wherever they go, by being themselves peaceable. They shall then be called the sons of Him, who is "the God of Peace."

(8) They have been persecuted for righteousness' sake. In other words, they have done what is right, and have taken the consequences—reproach, violence, slander (v. 11)—the hardest things in the world to bear.

If you ever hear anyone say that there is not much manliness in being humble, and meek, and merciful, and peaceable, remind them of this last Beatitude. It takes a brave man to do what is right, come what may.

[CORRECTION.—In last week's lesson, in line 31, for Luke vi. 20–49, read Luke vi. 20–26.]

IT is to be regretted that the name of the church (Methodist New Connexion, apparently) is not given in which the lady members have recently "struck work" against bazaars. It should be made known for the everlasting honour of the men of the same church; because it is added that their husbands, acknowledging the justice of the strike, put their hands in their pockets, subscribed the money that was required in sums of £5 to £10 each, and thus left the lady members free to attend to the spiritual work of the church.

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH.

THE inner significance of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, as shown in the recent meetings at Amsterdam, was something far greater than might be gathered from outward appearances. Such is the judgment of Professor OTTO PFLEIDERER, writing in the Tägliche Rundschau an account of the Amsterdam Congress, of which he speaks as "a landmark in the development of religious life." (A translation of the whole of Dr. PFLEIDERER'S account will be found in another column.) The inner significance of the Council, in his view, was that it foreshadowed the all-embracing religion of humanity, showing how, amid all varieties of historical form of belief and church order, unity of the Spirit must prevail, and lead through all temporal forms of thought to the Eternal Truth.

This, again, was the teaching of Mr. CARPENTER'S paper on "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World" (published in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 19). "The fundamental conceptions of Christianity," he said, "will gradually be disengaged more clearly from their envelopments of outworn tradition. They will win more power in our social life, they will help more and more definitely—though by no means necessarily under the shelter or sanction of a single name—to shape the relations of peoples and guide the destinies of nations. . . . It is the goal of religion to inspire one faith. But we may expect that this will rather be attained by the slow approximation of ethical and spiritual aims than by the direct extension of any single creed." Other of the higher religions of the world will be "touched with the modern spirit; and what cannot bear the new quickening will droop and die." Then there will emerge a universal spiritual faith, dominated by the great thought of the Fatherhood of GOD.

The same conclusion was clearly in the mind of Mr. V. R. SHINDE, the representative of the Theists of India, and Mr. TOYOSAKI, who spoke for the Unitarians of Japan. Each nation of the earth must work out its own destiny in the realm of spiritual life, not submitting to the imposition of alien forms of faith, but drawing near to others through the breaking down of prejudice and the strengthening of the bonds of a common humanity. Then, as that humanity, with deepening reverence and clearer insight and loftier aspiration, finds its full expression in the true life with GOD, it must realise that there is but one spiritual faith in which all mankind are brothers.

Such looking forward to a universal religious faith, which from the very nature of the case cannot be now clearly formulated, may appear to some a mere vague and unsatisfactory exercise of the imagination. But that is to mistake its true significance. There are definite and all-important facts which can be clearly stated, as the constant basis, both now and in the future, of a living religious faith. Through all changes GOD remains, the Source of all life, the Giver of that growing light which is to shine into the perfect day; and man remains, with his capacity for growth to nobler stature and fuller knowledge. What that will mean to him in the future, how he will express his perfected faith, we need not attempt now to picture, and, indeed, it is not our concern. We have simply to be true to our present light. It is enough for us to be in GOD'S hands, and that He is leading us by the Spirit of Truth into the clearer day.

Thus the practical conclusion of the matter is, not that our energy is diffused in vague imaginings, but that we hold the more resolutely to our present faith, and with a new joy and exhilaration in the thought that truth only is our life, and more truth is to dawn. We strengthen our hold on truth, because we realise that so GOD holds us in life; and when thought broadens, and affection deepens, and aspiration takes a wider sweep, it is He who thus moves in the secret places of our inward life; He gives the vision and the new capacity for joy, and we the more trustingly commit our way to Him. Thus we see that at each stage of our progress, He is there, the Good Providence of our growing life, and not with us alone, but with others also. Their truth also is of GOD; He is leading them; they are to be true to their light. Thus the old nightmare of Orthodoxy is dispelled. No man now may curse his neighbour's faith; the only heresy is insincerity and wilful wrong. We may rejoice to learn from one another, and rejoice when new light comes to another; but for each one progress must be along the line of his own growth, as GOD gives him the capacity, and that comes as each one honestly and earnestly lives out his own life to the full measure of his strength.

So there should be for us in the fellowship of our Free Churches the most perfect joy, because there we seek reverently, and with all our powers, simply to give ourselves to GOD, to be led in His way. We have erected no barriers (save of our own slackness and unfaithfulness), but insist that our churches shall be always open to the Spirit of Truth, with no hindrance to the incoming of new light. And we must give ourselves with more strenuous loyalty to their service, seeking a truer spirit of devotion, new fidelity in practical helpfulness, more of sympathy and brotherly kindness, a larger measure of the spirit, of the mind and heart of CHRIST, because so we enter more perfectly into the truth which is already ours, and are prepared by this one way of present faithfulness for that which is to come. Let no one fear that trusting thus to the free ways of the Spirit our churches will lose their hold on Christian truth. That would be to doubt the power of the grace and truth of JESUS, to manifest the true ideal of life. When with humble faithfulness we ask to be led in GOD'S way He does not take from us His best gifts.

A CLEAR ISSUE.

MR. BALFOUR'S speech at Sheffield and the resignation of the Duke of DEVONSHIRE which it brought about have cleared the situation of many ambiguities, and have put something like a distinct issue before the country. "Do you desire," Mr. BALFOUR asks himself, "to alter fundamentally the fiscal tradition which has prevailed during the last two generations?" and he answers "Yes, I do." And there, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN would say, the murder is out. The rest of the world must decide, with the Duke of DEVONSHIRE, whether they are for Free Trade or Protection, and must side against Mr. BALFOUR and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, or for them, in accordance with their decision. Protectionists believed that our trade can be helped by the taxation of imports. Free Traders believe that such taxation can only hamper and hinder our trade; and after Mr. BALFOUR'S speech at Sheffield and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S speech at Glasgow, it is difficult to suppose that anyone can retain the delusion that there is a tenable half-way house between the two.

Mr. BALFOUR will not tax food—for the present—and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN will not tax raw material. Mr. BALFOUR seeks "liberty" to reverse our Free Trade policy in order to wrest fiscal concessions from other nations, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in order to increase Imperial unity as well. These aims and limitations are interesting in their way; but who supposes that, when once the right of this or that commercial, manufacturing, or industrial "interest" to tariff protection has been recognised, any such theoretical limitations will avail to arrest the flood-tide of sectional legislation to which the break-up of our present fiscal system must inevitably give rise? How, to begin with, is the line to be drawn between raw materials and manufactures, between food and raw materials, or between food and manufactures? The shades of gradation between them are infinite and their differences infinitesimal. Many commodities are capable of being classified in all three categories according to the use to which they are to be put. Whose voice will avail, in a Parliament of Protectionists, to say that this commodity shall enter free as raw material while that commodity is taxed as a manufactured article? What warrant have we in the fiscal history of other great commercial nations for the supposition that we can find any permanent resting place half way between complete Free Trade and all round Protection? What evidence is there in the utterances of either Mr. BALFOUR or Mr. CHAMBERLAIN of any determination, based on clear principle, to oppose all round Protection should the country return a majority ready to establish it? Why, if they reject the doctrines on which Free Trade is based—as they obviously do—should any such determination be expected of them?

Retaliation, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN frankly calls it—freedom to bargain, as the more sophisticated Mr. BALFOUR prefers to describe it—is the immediate programme which the revivified Protectionist party has decided to lay before the country. Protectionist countries are to be told that if they persist in raising barriers against our trade we shall erect barriers against theirs. This policy is urged as a measure of self-protection, and as the only way of bringing our neighbours to their senses. How this is to be carried out all round while we are still hampered with these nice distinctions between food, raw material, and manufactures it is difficult to see. What will Mr. BALFOUR do with a country which sends us practically nothing but food, or Mr. CHAMBERLAIN with one that sends us only raw material? But that is by the way. It would be well, before adopting retaliation as a policy, to come to a conclusion as to whether taxed imports are intrinsically a good thing or a bad. If they are a good thing why not confer them upon our people right away, without waiting to bargain about them? If they are a bad thing, why, in the name of common sense, are we to add to the evil of taxed exports the further evil of taxed imports? What satisfaction will it be to us, in suffering under them, to know that it is injuring our neighbours as well?

But would the threat of retaliation, apart from the injury its execution would do us, really help us in our "bargaining"?

I confess [says Mr. Balfour] that the very question seems to me to show that the questioner lives in a world of economic phantasmagoria, with no relation whatever to the realities in which, fortunately or unfortunately, our lot is cast. . . .

I am incapable of believing that a nation which deliberately deprives itself of its power of bargaining is a nation which is likely to make very good bargains.

If Mr. BALFOUR would himself turn his mind from phantasmagoria and glance at the realities around him, he would discover that without any threats (power to use which, by the bye, we have never, as he supposes, abandoned) we already possess all the privileges in foreign markets which our rivals, with all their retaliations and preferences, have been able to secure. Has Mr. BALFOUR never heard of our "Most Favoured Nation" treaties, by which every country, with the most trivial exceptions, conceding reductions in tariffs to any of our rivals, is bound simultaneously to concede the same reductions to ourselves? How long does he suppose these treaties would survive the differential retaliation on our part which he advocates? Mr. BALFOUR'S admiration of the fiscal policy of the United States is unbounded, and no country has made greater efforts than it in the way of tariff bargaining. Yet the fact remains that while English goods are admitted to France at the minimum tariff, goods from the United States are still compelled to pay the maximum. How long would that advantage remain to us if we began trying to bargain with France for a further reduction, under a threat of the imposition of new duties on her goods at our ports?

And what is to be said of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S elaboration of his scheme for encouraging Imperial consolidation by taxing the food of the home population? His nice balancings of fresh taxes and remissions is of value only on paper. The remissions themselves are overdue quite apart from Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S scheme, and are of no value as compensation for the introduction of the dangerous principle of the protective taxation of necessities. As for the suggestion that these new duties are necessary if we wish to prevent separation, we believe that it is as untrue as it is gratuitously insulting to our kinsmen beyond the seas. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S question to himself at Glasgow, "Why cannot you let well alone?" must receive more convincing arguments than this libel on our Colonies, or the curious statistics by which he sought to prove that our trade had been "practically stagnant for thirty years," before he and Mr. BALFOUR will persuade the people to surrender their right to buy in the cheapest market, and to follow them in their ill-omened enterprise.

IT is fortunate to be of noble ancestry; it is not less so, to be such that people do not care to be informed whether you are noble or ignoble.—La Bruyère.

PROFESSOR PFLEIDERER ON THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

LAST week's Protestantenblatt republished the following account of the International meetings at Amsterdam, contributed by Professor Otto Pfleiderer, of Berlin, to the Tägliche Rundschau. We translate freely from the German:—

The Congress of Free Religious Thinkers and Workers met in Amsterdam Sept. 1–4, a Congress the inner significance of which, as a landmark in the development of religious life, was far greater than might be gathered from outward appearances. Neither political nor ecclesiastical authorities were represented, and no telegrams of homage to high personages were despatched. It was a repetition of the Congress which met two years ago in London, on the invitation of the English and American Unitarians, including representatives of free religious thought from Holland, England, America, Germany, France, Switzerland, Hungary, India and Japan, who now met again in Amsterdam, some hundreds in number, for exchange of thought as to their convictions and mutual encouragement in their hopes.

The proceedings began with a religious service in the venerable Walloon Church of Amsterdam, when one of the most eminent preachers of Holland delivered a moving sermon on 1 Cor. xiii. The note thus struck of large-hearted tolerance, united with the freest personal conviction, dominated the proceedings of the following days. It was in keeping with the international character of the gathering that addresses in Dutch, English, German, and French followed one another in motley succession, while of the Dutch alone, printed translations were placed in the hands of foreign listeners. It was taken for granted that the majority of those present would understand the other languages. There was rich variety, also, in the contents of the addresses. Subjects from the history and philosophy of religion (e.g., the place of Christianity in religious history, the conception of Christ in primitive Christian belief in the light of the history of religion, personality and religion, &c.) were mingled with others on questions of education and instruction in elementary and high schools, and on the religious and ecclesiastical conditions in various countries.

The prevailing note in all these addresses was a well-considered sobriety in the judgment of the present, with joyful confidence in regard to the future. One was conscious of being devoted to a cause, maintained, indeed, at the moment only by a diminishing minority, and with no prospect for a long time of any position of public influence, to which, notwithstanding, the future belongs, since the course of the religious development of mankind from inward necessity makes for a unity of the spirit, before which the differences of existing churches and denominations, while they will not quite disappear, must fall into their just position of subordination. A foreshadowing of this all-embracing religion of humanity, which regards the historical churches, indeed, as necessary means to the end, but sets the Eternal Truth above all historical vehicles, and must and shall demonstrate unity of spirit as beyond all church forms that separate —a foreshadowing of this ideal end in unobtrusive germ, but with rich promise for the future, was furnished by this "council of heretics," as one speaker, with general approval, called the Congress.

At the close of the proceedings, the Dutch Committee and its officers (Leiden professors of theology) received the well-deserved thanks of the assembly for their devoted efforts and care in arranging for the Congress, and for their splendid hospitality towards the foreign guests; a committee representing the various comtries taking part in the Congress was appointed, and it was determined to hold the next meeting two or three years hence, at Geneva. May the Germans be more numerously represented there than on this occasion at Amsterdam!

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT:*

II.

SURVEY OF THE FIELD.

It remains for us to make a rapid survey of the various nations included in our Association, and chronicle the recent events and activities which have direct significance to it.

England.

In no country has the cause of religious liberalism profited so greatly through the existence of this Council as in England. The influence of the London meetings in 1901 has proved a quickening influence, especially in Unitarian circles, and fruitful of the happiest results to their religious and church life. Our Association may not be able to render any service to our British friends in their present noble struggle against attempted priestly interference with their system of popular education. We cannot, however, forbear expressing to them our heartfelt sympathy with their determination to free their public schools from ecclesiastical domination. We utter the hope that in this instance also the cause of pure religion and perfect liberty may speedily prevail.

The establishment of a new quarterly, the Hibbert Journal, in England, devoted to free scholarship and the scientific investigation of religious and philosophical problems, is an event of great importance to the liberal cause. The issues which have already appeared indicate the high character, inclusive spirit, and abundant intellectual and material resources of the new publication. We welcome it as a powerful ally in the work of religious enlightenment and progress.

France.

From France have ever proceeded the ennobling and emancipating influences which have enlightened and advanced the human race. The parent of many of the most illuminating ideas and generous impulses of modern civilisation, she herself has often profited last and least by her heroic endeavours for truth and freedom. But out of her struggles and anguish have been born the great sentiments of equality, liberty, and fraternity which have redeemed and uplifted the political and religious order, and carried human society forward to new heights of virtue and achievement. We note with especial satisfaction that, after long eclipse, the spirit of religious freedom is re-asserting itself in the French Protestant Church, and that the liberal minority meets with a more just appreciation and kindly treatment on the part of their more orthodox brethren. The Protestant Theological Faculty at the University of Paris, composed of representatives of untrammelled critical investigation and a broad and spiritual religion, is a powerful influence towards the realisation of the liberal ideal of "a free church in a sovereign state."

The great struggle now going on in France between the Republic and the Clergy is one that interests and affects the whole world. There can be no question to which side the sympathies of this Council are inclined. Grave consequences, involving the entire separation of the Church from the State, may be contained in it. Whether such a separation would be immediately favourable to the cause of religious liberalism in France we are not able to judge. But we venture to express the hope and record the conviction that, in the long run, any proceeding which releases the Church from governmental and hierarchical control, and increases the voluntary and personal responsibility of its members for its conduct and support, must be favourable to both religion and human liberty.

French Protestantism of the liberal type has recently been called upon to sustain great losses in the death of some of its most eloquent supporters. Besides Prof. Auguste Sabatier, that profound and spiritual thinker, whose writings were the inspiration of two continents, we have to chronicle the recent and sudden death of Rev. Ernest Fontanès. For fifty years of active ministry he was an eloquent and brave exponent of liberal Christianity. An enthusiastic member of this Council, his genial presence and impressive addresses at our London meeting in 1901 added much to the interest of that occasion. In him we mourn the loss of a noble co-worker for the religion of reason and righteousness, and to his widow we send the assurances of our deepest sympathy and regard.

Another lost leader, remembered with devout respect and sorrow, is the Rev. Etienne Coquerel, the late editor of the organ of French liberal Protestantism, Le Protestant of Paris. A member of a family very distinguished in the annals of Free Thought, he admirably sustained the traditions of his kindred by an unspotted life full of service to his country and church. We take this occcasion to acknowledge the cordial spirit shown us by the religious journal which in the hands of our friend and his successor has been the ally of every true movement of our time for religious reform and progress.

We trust, in conclusion, that our French brethren, despite the absorbing issues in which they are engaged at home, may cultivate an increased interest in the cause of International liberalism. Thus alone can they vindicate the historic mission of France, and fulfil the noble utterance of Fénélon: "Limitless as is our debt to our own country we owe far more to the Great Fatherhood, Mankind. All men are brothers."

Germany.

The depression which exists in liberal religious circles in Germany at the present day is well known, and is to be made the special subject of a paper by one of our delegates from that country.

Were the "Druck von Oben," the pressure from above, to be relaxed by the Government and the consistories, our International movement would doubtless find many friends and supporters in that country from which, more than from any other, have proceeded the accurate scholarship, the profound learning, and the deep philosophic speculation without which all religious freedom and advance would be impossible.

As it is, the endeavours of an earnest, courageous minority in the German Church to maintain the ideals of a free and spiritual Christianity against the powers that be in Church and State deserve our hearty recognition.

The Protestantenverein, the great liberal organisation of Germany, still counts its 150,000 adherents, and holds its stated district and general conferences. We cherish the hope for closer relations with it in years to come. The freedom of academic teaching which distinguishes the German Universities, enables us to profit by the learned and able researches of great investigators like Professors Harnack, Pfleiderer, Wendt, Holtzmann, and Delitzsch—not to mention others. The contributions of these great teachers to the science of religion are of vast importance, and furnish the indispensable basis for our liberal thinking.

Appreciative reference should be made to the hospitable spirit displayed towards our Council by the Protestantenblatt, the organ of the Protestantenverein, now published jointly at Berlin and Bremen. Our faithful and devoted co-worker Dr. Schieler, now of Dantzig, has contributed to this journal a series of articles setting forth the proceedings of our London meetings, and giving a most favourable impression of its spirit and aims. The free-religious congregations of Königsberg, Dantzig, and Tilsit, who for long years have bravely held aloft the standard of free thought and worship in North-Eastern Germany, also send us delegates, whom we cordially welcome.

While the teachers and preachers of a free and spiritual Christianity are comparatively few, and are pursued with severe persecution, yet their heroism is not without effect on the German mind and conscience It is probable that the great majority of educated Germans secretly sympathise with the liberal position. This fact, together with the liberalising influence of the German Universities, cannot but in time win the victory over tradition and dogma. The land of Luther and Kant and Schleiermacher cannot for ever continue to display an entire religious indifference on the one hand and a bigoted churchism on the other. Sooner or later there will be a rebirth of rational and spiritual Christianity which will fulfil the prophecy of the great German thinker Goethe: "The time of the religion of rites and dogmas has passed away. Behold the dawning of the religion of character and deeds! This is the new labarum which will lead on to the victory of the Kingdom of God."

* Report of the Executive Committee of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, presented at Amsterdam on Wednesday, Sept. 2, by the Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendte.

Switzerland.

Perhaps the most notable accession to our cause during the past year is the adhesion of the Swiss Association for Free Christianity (Schweizerisches Verein für freies Christentum), whose honoured president, the Rev. Gottfried Schönholzer of Zürich, is present at this Council, and bears us the greetings of his association. He will more fully inform us concerning the principles and aims of his Society. In spirit and purpose it will be found to closely resemble our own. It represents the liberal wing of the Swiss National Church, which includes over a third of its ministers and Churches. It supports four religious weeklies, and is engaged in various practical Christian enterprises. Better still, it has won for the Swiss liberals absolute freedom from doctrinal restrictions. Not even the Apostles' Creed, so-called, is now enjoined in the Churches, and the use of the liturgy is similarly optional. One of the members of this Swiss Verein, Prof. E. Montet, D.D. is already known to us as a valued member of our Executive Committee, and the author of important theological works. As dean of the theological faculty of the University of Geneva, he, and his associate professors, assure the liberal character of that seminary for preachers, of which John Calvin was once the ruling spirit. The theological faculty of Zürich also is liberal in composition.

Servetus Memorial.

Another sign of the relaxing and humanising of theological systems common to our time is the popular movement begun by Prof. Doumergue and other members of the French-speaking Reformed Church, to erect at Geneva, on the spot where the martyr Michael Servetus, at the instigation of John Calvin, was burned for conscience sake, an expiatory monument. It is to take the form of an obelisk, the symbol of ascending flame. Its inscription will set forth the abhorrence felt by the modern conscience for this intolerant and cruel deed, and the sorrow felt by the spiritual descendants of Calvin at the terrible error of their great leader, "an error which," they remind us, "yet was common to his age." It is intended to unveil this monument on October 25 next, the 350th anniversary of the martyrdom of Servetus. This undertaking seems to us one of the most beautiful and Christian displays of the new century, as well as a most significant indication of the lessening of dogmatic and sectarian prejudices.

Socinus Tercentenary.

It brings to mind the fact that the 300th anniversary of the death of Faustus Socinus will occur next year. It is proposed that the Unitarians of the United States, England, and Hungary shall commemorate the illustrious services of this early and brave witness for religious truth by affixing a tablet with a suitable inscription to the house in Siena, Italy, where both Faustus and his free-thinking Uncle Laelius Socinus resided, and which is still standing. The consent of the city magistracy is already assured, and it is hoped the project may be carried out successfully.

Other Countries

Our warmest congratulations are extended to our Hungarian Unitarian friends on the opening of the new and beautiful college building erected for them by the Government at Koloszvar. It will doubtless prove a valuable adjunct in the work of their venerable institution of learning, the lighthouse of liberal faith in Transylvania.

It should be recorded that Bishop Ferencz, Prof. Boros, and others, made and published a Hungarian translation of nearly all the papers in the printed report at the London meeting. This volume has enjoyed quite a large circulation in Hungary, and spread among this far Eastern people a knowledge of our principles and aims.

In Italy also Prof. F. Bracciforti, an enthusiastic member of our Council, has translated and published Italian translations of the papers read at the London meetings by Professors Pfleiderer, Carpenter, and Drummond, and the Revs. Armstrong, Crothers and Wendte. This gave increased circulation to these utterances.

It is impossible in the limited space at our command to chronicle all the encouraging signs of liberal religious progress in the various countries with which we are affiliated.

The spread of more radical views of religion and life in Denmark, and generally in Scandinavia, is especially gratifying, and we heartily welcome the representatives of this free church movement to our Council.

The strength of the liberal movement in all the Protestant Churches of the Kingdom of the Netherlands is well shown by the splendid reception our Association meets with at their hands on the present occasion. Too much cannot be said in acknowledgment of the untiring and well planned efforts of the local Secretary, Prof. B. D. Eerdmans, the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, and their hard-working committees. But we surely ought to allude at least to the great service rendered us by De Hervorming, the organ of the Protestantenbond, the Zondagsbode, organ of the Mennonite Church, and other Dutch journals, in spreading the good news of our Council.

India and Japan.

The presence among us of delegates from the Brahmo Somaj or congregations of Hindoo Theists of India, and of the Japanese Unitarian Church, brings us into fraternal touch with that Oriental world whose ancient civilisations and religions were the cradle of innumerable faiths, including our own.

It is one of our cherished hopes that this Council shall yet hold a session in the Valley of the Ganges and the Land of the Rising Sun, if only to vindicate the great central doctrine of our faith, that while religions are many, religion itself is one; that all men everywhere are brethren, and have one common and divine Father.

America.

This reference to the oldest of civilisations leads us, in closing this review, to treat briefly of the liberal attitude of one of the youngest of the great nations of the earth, the United States of America. I will not anticipate the paper of my esteemed friend the President of the American Unitarian Association on this topic, but will confine myself to the purely international features of the subject.

The reproach has often been brought against the United States that, selfishly absorbed in its home affairs, it did not take a proper interest in the great concerns of humanity throughout the world. In reply it might be urged that a nation which has received from Europe 21 millions of immigrants, for the most part belonging to the impoverished, ignorant, and depressed classes, and, amalgamating them into its civic and industrial life, has lifted them and their children to an independent, self-respecting, and responsible citizenship—such a nation cannot justly be said to have made no adequate contribution to the progress of humanity and the welfare of the other peoples of the earth! But the results of the Spanish-American war, and the vast industrial expansion of the United States in foreign countries, has compelled it, voluntarily or involuntarily, to take a more prominent part in the great concert of nations.

American Ideals.

Shall the American people be content with a merely selfish exploitation of foreign markets for material profit? Shall it, like many another powerful nation in times past and present, become a despoiler and oppressor of the weaker peoples of the earth? Or shall it follow more enlightened and humane counsels, presenting to the world the example of a nation actuated by a lofty desire for peaceful and amicable relations with our fellows, of whatever race, colour, or clime; giving them an example of civil freedom and righteousness, of international justice and good-will which shall make us true leaders of the human family in all that uplifts and ennobles? The answer to this question we find impressively given in the noble life and teachings of that great American, Ralph Waldo Emerson, the 100th anniversary of whose birth has just been celebrated in the United States with almost unparalleled reverence and unanimity.

Emerson was one of the most genuine and characteristic fruits of American civilisation. He never tired of urging upon his countryman that they be true to the circumstances and genius of their own nation, and not merely imitators of European ideas and institutions. From him, chiefly, dates our indigenous New World literature and religious liberalism. But he equally believed in humanity, and embraced the entire race in this sympathy and hope. He despised the narrow patriotism which consists in noisy, vain-glorious shouting for one's own country, whether right or wrong. "A right patriotism," he tells us, "consists in the delight which springs from contributing our peculiar and legitimate advantages to the benefit of humanity."

To Emerson every nation embodies some special type or phase of social and moral development, and gives utterance to some great thought or purpose, which no other nation represents so clearly.

For their common welfare, therefore, nations should be reciprocal in their relations with each other. The true patriot is he who, recognising this, endeavours to make the ideas and institutions of his own country a contribution to the higher welfare and happiness of mankind. "We want men," Emerson says, "of original perception and original action, who can open their eyes wider than to a nationality; namely to considerations of benefit to the human race, and can act in the interests of civilisation."

Such, then, is the international ideal of an enlightened Americanism. It is because they find this ideal foreshadowed in the spirit and aims of this International Council that it has met with the enthusiastic support of religious liberals in the United States; who were, indeed, among its first initiators and promoters. In this Council each nation represented, each religious fellowship which sends us delegates, contributes its characteristic ideas, its peculiar advantages to hearten and strengthen the others, and receives, in turn, the illumination and encouragement which come from concert of action in a great and uplifting cause.

In this spirit, brethren, let us continue to confer and work together for "pure religion and perfect liberty" throughout the world. And thus may we realise on earth the vision of our great leader and inspirer: "They shall come from the East and the West, and the North and the South, and shall sit down together in the Kingdom of God."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

Our churches are stirring with the new and revived works characteristic of autumn. Possibly, uneasy recollections of the Daily News census returns are partly responsible; but, however that be, there appears to be unusual effort in many directions. One prominent feature of the season is the new series of "popular services" in theatres. It is several years since this kind of appeal was made to the attention of the unchurched multitudes. The two theatres engaged—the Carlton, Greenwich (first service October 11), and the Grand, Islington (first service November 8)—are situated in densely populated districts; and if a good corps of volunteer canvassers can be secured to second the advertising arrangements of the London District Unitarian Society, we ought to reach thousands to whom, not only our message, but any and every religious message is unfamiliar. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, as minister-at-large, sounds a stirring note of appeal in his monthly "London Letter" which I heartily commend to careful attention.

During the summer the Rev. H. S. Perris, of Little Portland-street Chapel, made an experiment in open-air services at Regent's Park. Although the venture was but tentative, and the arrangements extremely modest, he assures me that the response to his effort was most encouraging, and he urges an organised movement for next summer. Hitherto, I believe, all such enterprise has been left to individuals; it is time to support one another in this work, and I hope Mr. Perris will stir us up in good time for the next campaign. It is worth doing thoroughly, if at all. Meanwhile, Mr. Perris reports a fresh engagement of the Rev. Stopford Brooke to take services at Little Portland-street, beginning November 8. This also is a kind of special propaganda, for it is notorious that many will attend this great preacher's ministrations who otherwise rarely or never enter our doors. The congregation is to be commended for its courage and zeal in undertaking the responsibility of this engagement.

Turning to matters of more local interest, I should like to mention some of the many endeavours and achievements connected with the several congregations, not only for the sake of their credit, but, if it be possible, to open the eyes of some to the fact that while they do nothing much themselves, and wonder why others do so little, there is really a great deal of energy being put forth. I have before me, for instance, the calendar of Essex Church, Notting Hill Gate. This is one of our largest churches, well manned (and womaned), with a long list of affiliated classes and societies. Many of these have, of course, their parallel elsewhere; but I think the church library is more prominent here than at any other of our London churches. A very attractive catalogue, with portraits of authors, has just been issued, and will, no doubt, add in a gratifying way to the librarian's work. The Rev. F. K. Freeston announces a special course of four Sunday evening sermons on "The Story of a Heresy"—readers may shrewdly guess which particular heresy.

The close of 1903 will be an era in the history of the church at Quex-road, Kilburn. It is just ten years since, chiefly through the enthusiastic labours of Dr. Brooke Herford, this congregation was founded. Steadily, year by year, it has met the automatic reduction of the grants in aid, and, though the strain thus imposed has been rendered severer by costly difficulties connected with the structure of the present hall-church, the members, under their vigorous leader, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, have never flinched. With exemplary self-denial they have fulfilled the bond, and 1904 will see them a free and independent congregation. I may remind readers that the site is secured for the church to which the hall has been but a preliminary; the treasurer has £1,100 in hand, and the most fitting way for us to celebrate the success of the movement will be to see that so well deserving a congregation gets its deserts in the erection of a really commodious and beautiful place of worship. Among the fresh enterprises for this season is a Sunday Afternoon Conference for young men, for which a succession of able leaders has been provided.

It is encouraging to hear that the Rev. G. Critchley sees manifest signs of new growth in the congregation at Clarence-road, Kentish Town. It was something like valour to address himself to the revival of the work here, when it had ebbed so far; the new season opens with a church building rendered neat and attractive, the Sunday-school steadily growing, and strangers coming more frequently than of late within the gates. It would be a great joy to see again the full tide of prosperity at Clarence-road, and to know that so impressive a preacher reached the hearts of the multitudes in that district.

At Rosslyn-hill and the Bell-street and Rhyl-street Missions, widely various as they are in work, there is assuredly one spirit animating the leaders. We in London have already felt the reinforcing influence of the Rev. H. Gow's presence amongst us, and we look to Hampstead with confident expectations. The Rev. S. Street and Dr. Read, who are respectively in charge at the two N.W. missions, are grappling with their problems manfully, and if they are only backed by helpers as they should be there is little doubt of the result. George's-row is blessed by the continued supervision of that veteran missionary, the Rev. F. Summers, and abounds as ever in its good work.

On Wednesday next the Provincial Assembly will meet at Highgate, and visitors will see for themselves many substantial evidences of the truly missionary spirit that animates this congregation. They will doubtless hear of the reading-room and library, clubs, extension classes, and other agencies for good, but they will not see the Sunday-school and classes—a sight to be remembered. So much young life, not of children merely, surges round this church that the "succession" is well assured. The Rev. R. H. Greaves has a good work in hand, and will certainly put a man's full energy into it this season. Farther north, at Wood Greed, the Rev. Dr. Mummery has arranged a two-months' series of "forward movement" addresses for Sunday evenings, in which he will be assisted by several other ministers. His splendid zeal, despite his years, is good to see. The congregation, ever sociable, is equally zealous in promoting the "Unity Social Club," and evidently means to thrive. At Stoke Newington Green, too, the evidences of an earnest, intelligent religious life are manifold. In a few years (1908), this congregation will be two hundred years old, and, honourable as its past has been, it may be fearlessly said that at no time in its history has it displayed more true Christian philanthropy than now. Classes, meetings, schools, clubs—here is a crowded list of them; and the best of all is that they are so effectively officered, and that the Rev. W. Wooding has around him so loyal a company. Unity, Islington, is in the awkward position of being without a settled minister at present: would that "the right man" would speedily come and make himself felt in that crowded borough!

The work at Hackney is receiving new impetus, and classes and meetings are being re-started or begun for the first time; week evening lantern lectures are to be given in the church, and the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor is lecturing on Friday evenings in the Hackney Town Hall. By these and other means it is hoped to win again a success recalling the past of this important and representative congregation. It has a beautiful church, and ought to be a blessing to many in this densely populated part.

A good thing, a specially good thing, has to be reported in connection with Mansford-street. A lady of culture has left Kensington to take up her dwelling among the "mean streets" of Bethnal Green, and so help the Rev. J. Ellis's work here (Who will do the same for poor Bermondsey, where the Rev. Eustace Thompson is working away all but single-handed?) Another thing about Mansford-street. Mr. Ellis has arranged, I believe, for a succession of students from M.C.O. to lodge periodically in the district and share the work practically. If a "Toynbee Hall" should grow out of this—why not? Let the unbeliever and faint-hearted go down to Mansford-street himself and see all that is being so admirably done, and some of the all besides that cries out to be done. Farther East still, we come to Stepney, Limehouse, Stratford, and Forest Gate. Under Mr. Ginever, Stepney's life is again quickening, while at Limehouse Mr. Toye has no new development to report for the very sufficient reason that all the space and all the time have been long filled up, day after day and year after year, by his good work. Bravely the Stratford people go on their way, mostly self-helped, and, me judice, they have no mean record to show. At Forest Gate, the Rev. H. W. Perris has had singular success in attracting school-masters and mistresses, having something like a score of them on his list of members. If we can but teach the teachers! Surely that is one of our brightest hopes. Mr. Perris is extensively advertising a service of religious "studies," and I am sure his efforts will be loyally supported by his congregation.

Thus far, I have only glanced only at London north of the river, and, long as this "letter" is, here is the south, begging a word also. Crossing over into the south-east, we find Plumstead vigorously pushing on, and only longing for a larger place of worship in which adequate numbers might be gathered. Then comes Deptford, where the Rev. A. J. Marchant, amid many heavy burdens, public and private, has steadfastly laboured for twelve long years and won for himself and his work a genuine respect. "To write the same things" is easy for me, and to echo them easy for the reader; but who will go down into those old Deptford streets and help our good brother? Again I say, go and see the place, the people, and the workers.

When we turn to Lewisham, we reach one of the brightest spots in our London outlook. The Rev. W. C. Pope has infused his own manly snthusiasm into a rare band of workers. Where else—in London, at least—could we find a body of men willing (and proving themselves able) to paint their own church when it needed renovation? I have seen a photograph of the workers equipped, minister included, for this very practical piece of Christian usefulness; and, further, I have seen the work itself, and could wish the "British workman" had always so high a standard of excellence set before him. There is a very popular and useful Literary Society here, and Sunday afternoon conferences for men and women are to be a new feature this season. The congregations are large and attentive. If only a site could be secured for the buildings imperatively needed! Well, perhaps it will be before long.

I have mentioned Bermondsey in a parenthesis, but, pace my friends, I would fain be eloquent on the needs of this typically dull district. I forbear this time, hoping that the word said will prove effectual. Peckham, in spite of losses by removals, &c., continues its good work under the Rev. G. Carter, while at Stamford-street, Blackfriars, the busy season begins in the absence of a leader to take up the reins held for the past five years by the Rev. F. Allen. At Brixton and Wandsworth special courses of evening addresses are announced, the subject taken by the Rev. F. W. Stanley being "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," and my own being "A Re-statement of Unitarianism." Space fails for further details; but here is enough, I hope, to suggest to those interested, something of the nature and spirit of our present work. May this winter find in us better preachers, better workers, happier all in every way!

W. G. TARRANT.

THE October number of the Mill Hill Pulpit begins a new volume, the twelfth, of the regular monthly issue of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons. The subject of this month's sermon is "Faithful unto Death. Thoughts beside the tomb of William the Silent, assassinated at Delft, July 10, 1584." It is a great subject, vividly treated, picturing one of the most heroic of men. The sermon should not be missed by any of our recent visitors to Holland.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

We have news of services at the following places, in addition to those noted below:—

Allostock: Sunday Afternoon. — Preacher, Rev. G. A. Payne. Collection, £3 3s. 6d.

Chelmsford.—Preacher, Mr. Hawkins, of Herne Hill.

Knutsford (September 27).—Preacher, Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. Collection, £10.

London: George's Row.—Preacher, Mr. Delta Evans.

London: Peckham. — Preacher, Rev. G. Carter.

Manchester: Longsight (September 27).—Preacher, Rev. H. J. Rossington. In the afternoon a musical service. In the evening the music included a rendering of Mendelssohn's "42nd Psalm," which was repeated on Monday evening.

Stockton-on-Tees. — Preacher, the Rev. Henry Cross.

Aberdare: Highland-place. — Rev. H. Fisher Short preached on Sunday week, on the words "The Truth shall make you free," giving a brief outline of his pilgrimage from Methodism to Unitarianism. During the last few weeks Mr. Short has made an interesting departure from the ordinary evening service. Instead of reading a second lesson from the Scriptures, he delivers a short address on some appropriate subject to the children. Large congregations have been attending Highland-place during September.

Ashton-under-Lyne. — The sixth annual school sermons were preached last Sunday, in the morning by the minister, the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., and in the evening by the Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., of Denton. In the afternoon the children of the school rendered the service of song entitled "A Noble Life: the Story of Theodore Parker." The attendance at each of the three services was larger than that of last year. The collections for the day amounted to £13 10s.

Bolton (Bank-street).—The annual meeting of the Bank-street Temperance Society, which has a membership of 166, was held on Tuesday evening, the Rev. C. J. Street, the President, in the chair. Mr. J. Chatterton presented a satisfactory report of the year's work, and expressed the great regret of the members at their President's impending departure to Sheffield. The report and accounts, which showed a small balance in hand, having been passed, Mr. Street delivered an address in review of the situation, and Mr. R. B. Dack spoke on "Our present pressing needs." Votes of thanks and prayer brought the meeting to a close Heaton Moor.—A successful social evening, the first of the season, was held on Friday, October 2. A series of meetings has also been arranged by the newly formed Literary and Social Society, at which subjects of religious, moral, and social interest are to be seriously discussed. The harvest thanksgiving services were held on October 4, when the Rev. W. G. Cadman, of Macclesfield, was the preacher, and members of the Stockport choir assisted with the music.

Kilmarnock.—The Macedonian massacres formed the subject of a lecture by the Rev. A. Irvine Innes, in Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church on Sunday evening last, and at the close of the service the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the congregation:—"That we solemnly record our condemnation and abhorrence of the frightful outrages and massacres committed by Turkish troops in Macedonia, and earnestly desire that the British Government should exert its power to put an immediate stop to the practice of such atrocities, and to bring about the establishment of justice and freedom in that misgoverned country."

Liverpool (Bond-street). — The winter's work of the North End Domestic Mission was commenced on the 23rd ult., with a social evening, under the auspices of the Young People's Union and Temperance Society, when the members to the number of about one hundred spent a most enjoyable time. On Sunday last the annual harvest festival services were held, conducted afternoon and evening by Mr. W. E. Topping.

London (Essex Church).—On Sunday next the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will commence a course of evening addresses on "The Place of Servetus: or, The Story of a Heresy." (1) The First Heretics.; (2) The Age of Martyrs; (3) The Founders of Socinianism; (4) The Fathers of Unitarianism.

Malton.—The chapel interior has been renovated. On Monday, the Rev. Jas. Harwood, B.A., gave the first lecture of the season in the chapel to a good and interested audience, on "A Visit to India."

Manchester (Chorlton-cum-Hardy).—Harvest services were celebrated in the Wilbraham-road Unitarian Church, on Sunday, September 27, the sermons being preached by the Rev. J. Ruddle. On the following Friday, October 2, Mr. Ruddle delivered the presidential address at the opening meeting of the Chorlton-cum-Hardy Literary Association, urging in the words of Sir Philip Sidney, that the Association should tend to "the enriching of memory and the enabling of judgment." Just about the same time the congregation heard with exceeding great regret that Mr. A. E. Piggott, one of the founders of the church, and a most untiring and cheerful worker in almost every department of its activity, has decided, for domestic reasons, to leave the district, and will henceforth be too far from the church to be able longer to hold office or attend the services.

Selby.—In the report last week of the opening of the new chapel, it was said that the Rev. C. Hargrove was to have preached the sermon. It was the service he was to have taken, the duty of preaching having been assigned from the first to the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones.

South Shields.—The annual harvest thanksgiving services were conducted in Unity Church, on Sunday, September 27, by the Rev. Chas. Travers, Carlisle. The Sunday-school scholars assembled in the church in the afternoon, when Mr. A. Robinson (superintendent) delivered a very appropriate address. On Wednesday, September 30, a fruit banquet was held in the school-room, and the occasion was used to make a series of presentations to Mr. Thos. Paxton, who has resigned his pastorate in order to become a student at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. A. Robinson (president of the church) occupied the chair, and was supported by Alderman J. Baxter Ellis (Newcastle), Councillor Henderson, and others. The presents, which consisted of a revolving and tilting study chair, and a parcel of valuable books from the church members and friends, were presented by Mrs. Armitage and Mr. Bolam, while a pedestal writing-desk, subscribed for as a public testimonial in recognition of Mr. Paxton's public services in the borough, was presented by Mr. A. Lawson. Mr. Paxton feelingly responded. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Alderman J. Baxter Ellis and Councillor Henderson. A programme of music was rendered during the evening.

THE Unitarian World this month naturally devotes the greater part of its space to the International Council, publishing in addition to notes and the President's address a good part of the paper by Mr. Edwin D. Mead on "The World's Debt to Holland in the Cause of Peace," and Professor Bruining's paper on "The Need for an Aggressive Liberal Theology."

LAST winter public attention in Manchester was roused to consider the sleeping-out problem, the fact that large numbers of people spent their nights near the brick-kilns and elsewhere out of doors in and near the city. A special committee of the City Council has had the matter under consideration, and, after investigation, reports that those who sleep out include a considerable number of genuine working-men, who for lack of employment are reduced to this stress. The Committee recommends that the Local Government Board be asked to authorise the Casual Wards Joint Committee to accommodate destitute persons without requiring that they should enter the workhouse as paupers; that there should be a uniform system of registration of tramps enforced throughout the country, such as would assist the authorities in discriminating between various persons seeking relief; and that, to meet the exigencies of the present situation, all charitable institutions which provide shelter for the homeless poor, with satisfactory conditions as to labour test and sanitary requirements, should be assisted by the Corporation, provided that for the current financial year the sum to be so contributed shall not exceed £500.

Version Prepared by M. PRITCHARD.

With Introduction and Notes.

(Cloth, 8vo., red edges, price 3s. 6d.)

In this book an attempt has been made to get nearer to the meaning of the original by omitting some passages now held by many students to be interpolations, and also by first comparing several translations in order to select that word or phrase which seemed to convey the truest sense. It is hoped that by this means the great beauty, and wonderful teaching of this ancient masterpiece may be brought more clearly before the notice of the general reader.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE report of the Special Committee on Public Questions of the London and South Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly will be found in our present issue, and we commend it to the attention of all the churches. The subjects dealt with concern us all, and we are grateful for the light of moral and religious earnestness thrown upon them by the committee. One suggestion we would make to the managers of the Assembly's business. It is a mistake to ask the general meeting to adopt such a report: it ought simply to be received, and then for a public expression of opinion on any vital questions, distinct resolutions ought to be brought forward. The absence of any resolution on the Macedonian question surely was a grave omission.

WHEN President Loubet came to London to return the visit of the King there were on many sides expressions of the hope that the international goodwill then displayed might have some definite and permanent results in the conclusion of an agreement minimising the risks of misunderstanding in the future. That hope is now in some measure fulfilled, and on Wednesday a Treaty of Arbitration between Great Britain and France was signed in London by Lord Lansdowne and M. Cambon, the French Ambassador A similar treaty, it will be remembered, was signed between Great Britain and the United States some years ago as the sequel, curiously enough, to the dangerous encounter over the Venezuelan boundary. Its ratification however, was refused, for internal political reasons, by the American Senate, and the proposal fell through, although the settlement of specific outstanding disputes has been proceeding steadily ever since. In the case of France, however, as in the case of England, ratification of treaties is made by the Head of the State, on the advice of his Ministers, and not by the Senate, so that when once the treaty is signed ratification follows as a matter of course.

THE Treaty is limited in scope, as will be seen from its first and main article:—

Differences of a juridicial order or such as relate to the interpretation of the treaties existing between the two contracting parties which may arise between them, and which it may not be possible to settle by means of diplomacy, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of July 29, 1899, on condition, however, that they do not involve either the vital interests or the independence or honour of the two contracting States, and that they do not affect the interests of a third Power.

The agreement is made for a term of five years from the date of signature. But even so, one must be very thankful for such a step of progress.

THE visit of King Victor Emmanuel and his Consort to Paris this week forms another step in the interesting rapprochement between France and Italy now in progress. Manifestations of goodwill between any two Great Powers are, of course, intrinsically to be welcomed, but a good understanding between the liberal Western Powers is especially to be desired. England, France, and Italy represent ideals and aspirations to which the Chancelleries of the three Emperors are strangers, despite the forms of democratic government in domestic affairs conceded by two of them. Those ideals sadly need expression in international affairs—notably at the present moment in the Near East—and with a Liberal Government in authority at St. James's and a closer understanding with the Liberal Governments and peoples of the sister democracies, some far-reaching and greatly needed changes might be wrought, to which the United States could render no small moral support.

THE Lord Mayor of Birmingham presided on Friday week at a town's meeting held to urge the Government to join with other Powers in every possible effort to put an end to the Macedonian massacres. The Lord Mayor said the meeting had been called in response to a memorial signed by 650 memorialists, including citizens of every shade of opinion, religious and political. Sir O. Lodge then moved:—

That this meeting hereby records its conviction that considerations of humanity and policy alike demand that His Majesty's Government urge upon the other European Powers that they should take up a decisive attitude, and insist, in the first place, that an end should be made of Turkish methods of repression by massacre; and, in the second place, that some means be adopted whereby the internal administration of Macedonia be withdrawn from the control of the Porte.

The Bishop of Worcester, who seconded the resolution, said that the point they must never let Englishmen forget was the directness of the responsibility which in this matter belonged to Europe, and pre-eminently to England. They must demand the one irreducible minimum—an effective reform—and that was that the Macedonian people, divided into whatever districts the preponderance of nationality might suggest, should be under a Christian governor, responsible only to the Powers and removable only by them.

IN the fiscal controversy the most notable things since we last wrote have been the speeches of Mr. Asquith and Lord Rosebery. Of the "powerful and convincing speech" of the former, the Spectator last Saturday said: "He showed that the foundation-stone on which Mr. Chamberlain rears his fantastic pile of paradox and sophistry is utterly unsound." Even the Guardian is fain this week to admit, in reference to the same speech, that Mr. Chamberlain's Glasgow statistics, "it must be confessed, were not always perfectly convincing."

IT is an interesting pastime to trace the strange affinities that exist between things apparently the most dissimilar. It is a far cry, for example, from the large emporium of the universal provider to the Triennial Conference, or the Congregational Union. The kinship is to be found in that new power which the business world has put into harness and driven so far, the power of the combination. The object of such amalgamations, indeed, is merely for material profit. In the religious sphere we find the spirit of association working to quite other ends. Amongst ourselves there is a movement regarded by some as destined to crush liberty in one iron organisation, and by others to substitute for an ineffective individualism the true freedom that consists in an ampler union. Amongst our neighbours the clash of thought has regard to the forming of a United Congregational Church. That which has been crudely used in the commercial, and is now agitating the mind of the religious world, is contained is the thought of co-operation, and complex possibilities for the future are wrapped in this idea.

A good illustration of this tendency is the proposal to end the separate existence of Cheshunt and Hackney Colleges and to merge them into one larger establishment under some new title. The trustees of the college, the Countess of Huntingdon's College, at Cheshunt, find an obstacle to their plan in the warm opposition of many of the subscribers, who are also former students of the Hertfordshire institution. The advocates of the change describe the opponents as sentimentalists. It is natural that feeling should play a large part in the opinions of the men who have felt the charm of the old world house and chapel, the pleasant gardens, the restful quiet of the river walk. Are they not links in the long chain of five and twenty generations of merry, strenuous student life? An outsider may not venture to decide the dispute.

The Countess of Huntingdon's College has continued under this name from the time of Whitefield, first in Wales and then, for over a century, in its present home, at Cheshunt. It is still the Countess of Huntingdon's College, although for practical purposes it is a training ground for the Congregational ministry; its confession is still in accordance with the doctrinal Articles of the Church of England. Yet though symbols be crystal, thought is fluid. A quaint ceremony as it seems to us, a solemn action as it was to those first students, was witnessed at the inaugural meeting in the college chapel. The articles of doctrine were accepted by the men robed in their academic gowns rising in their places and holding up the right hand. That men are wholly defiled in all the faculties of soul and body; that it hath pleased God to predestinate some unto everlasting life; that men are accounted righteous before God only for the merits of Jesus Christ; that good works done before grace are not pleasant to God: perhaps the men of Cheshunt would not affirm as much to-day. These chips of an older faith are worn very small and smooth in the stream of time.

The Hibbert Journal with the present October number enters on its second year. Probably no theological quarterly has ever attained so high a position in so short a time. We most cordially wish it still greater strength and prosperity. We understand that the expenses of launching the journal have been very large, and that in spite of the many copies sold and the generous contributions from the Hibbert Fund, the editor and subeditor have given all their work gratuitously. One of the dangers arising from a journal being obtainable in all the best libraries is that we are tempted not to buy it for ourselves. We would appeal to the members of our Free Churches not merely to be content with according their approval and praise to this important venture, but to contribute to its success by becoming subscribers themselves.

If we look down, then our shoulders stoop. If our thoughts look down our character bends. It is only when we hold our head up that our body becomes erect. It is only when our thoughts go up that our life becomes erect.—A. McKenzie.

GARDEN CITY.

The site for the first Garden City has been well chosen. On the Hitchin and Cambridge branch of the Great Northern Railway, which runs through it for two and a half miles, a temporary station was opened on Friday and Saturday last week, gaily decorated with flags, red, white, and green; green, we may suppose, to indicate that the greenness of nature will not be destroyed, white for purity of air and water and of guiding purpose, and red for the cheerfulness which abounded in the promoters and in the large gathering of supporters which assembled to wish success to the new venture. Near the station is a considerable expanse of rather bare and common-place land, devoid of specially picturesque features; this is destined to be the centre of industry. The factories, therefore, will not destroy the most beautiful part of the estate, and, as it is proposed to generate power at a large central station which shall consume its own smoke, the atmosphere will not be spoilt. The most beautiful parts are on the outskirts, which are to be reserved for agricultural and residential purposes. Letchworth Park, with its finely matured trees, is just the right place to keep open to the public for ever, with its delightful scenery, and land obtained at "agricultural value," requiring little or no expense in laying out. Near the pretty village of Norton, which is on the estate, there is another plot of land just suited for a public park, and it would seem desirable that a third, if smaller, piece should be left open, including the Roman—or British—camp, through which runs the ancient Icknield Way. This Roman road continues for more than two miles through Garden City, at times a grassy lane, at times merely a footpath.

The old village of Norton was a retiring place for the monks of St. Albans, and used to be subject to different jurisdiction from that of the surrounding district. Another lovely village is Willian, which, however, lies outside the estate; but charming lanes, tree shaded and luxuriant in hedgerows, lead to it. The acquired land extends to the very verge of the country town of Baldock, and, in the opposite direction, ends about a mile from Hitchin station.

The deluge of rain which we have had this year has accumulated on only one small part of the Garden City land, which is proved, therefore, to be in no danger of flood. For the private view and luncheon the downpour ceased just in time, and a very interesting assembly of men and women filled the marquee for lunch. It was surely not imagination which made one remark on good health and the love of humanity as the characteristics of the deeply interested faces, as one stood on a bench at the side to hear the speech of Earl Grey who presided. It was noticeable also that "men of business" were there in good numbers in the audience and at the upper table. Earl Grey referred to his early interest in Mr. Howard's book on garden cities, his early fears, his complete conversion to belief in the practicability of the scheme, and his present cordial co-operation.

Perhaps the most touching reference in the course of the brief and excellent series of after-luncheon speeches was that of Mr. George Cadbury, who spoke of the effect on child life of even a few years of garden city surroundings, instead of those of the ordinary industrial areas. How feelingly did those who had seen the school-children of Port Sunlight and Bourneville, and contrasted them with the future citizens now learning their lessons and playing their games in the working-class districts of English towns, follow his plain statement of what the new scheme might mean to them! It was pointed out by one speaker that England had been the industrial pioneer of the world, and thus had been the first to get into the thick of the muddle of overcrowding and physical deterioration in town life, and that England ought, therefore, to be the pioneer in getting out of the difficulty. It was made known that £75,000 of the capital had been subscribed; more, however, is required to start under the best conditions for developing the city to the best advantage.

The Saturday after the invitation view was brilliantly fine, and again many came to see the place. An early walk before their arrival deepened the impression of the quiet beauty of the district, not a commanding picturesqueness which strikes the imagination, but the kind of peaceful English beauty which grows in the affections and is home-like. It is a rich undulating country, with abundant wild flowers and bramble fruits and berries, the prevailing chalk soil drying quickly at the surface after rain, with, in parts, gloriously healthy trees. One could regret that its charming rural character should be in any way disturbed by an importation of industrial life, did not the picture of the toil-worn, unhealthy, dull-eyed mill hands rise up before one's mind. What a blot upon the land would be a town of the common manufacturing type! But a Garden City, where the homes shall be healthy, where gardens shall abound, where the best of the natural beauty shall be carefully preserved, where no destructive, blighting smoke shall be allowed, where beauty of buildings shall be required and the happiness and convenience of all—even the poorest—jealously guarded—that we will welcome. And if some part of the wild loveliness of hedgerow and lane must be lost, we will have, instead, hundreds of healthy, strong-limbed, merry children playing among the flowers and trees, and men and women in houses that can be happy homes, in touch with nature, accustomed to beauty, and the opportunity of a full and joyful life.

Priestly Prime.

Without thought, grave, deliberate self-conscious thought, life will run shallow in every channel. Every active duty needs to build foundations downwards through habits of quiet thought. Every finer instinct needs to reach upward to the Sun of Righteousness through quiet thought. Then should we resolutely so order our lives that the days should not fly past in a ceaseless whirl which our minds leap to follow; but they would hold breathing spaces for the soul.

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

IN presenting their second Annual Report, the Public Questions Committee have endeavoured to deal with those matters, both foreign and domestic, which appear at the present moment most urgently to call for that moral watchfulness and religious activity which it is the special duty of the Churches and all Religious Societies to bring to bear upon the world.

International Amity.

(1) The wider knowledge of each other's history and aspirations which is now possessed by the great Western Nations, the vastly improved means of communication, and the forging by trade and commerce of bonds of mutual interest and dependence; these things have given a new urgency and significance to the petition: "Thy Kingdom come, and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

There has been in our country, during the last year, a marked dying down of the spirit of racial animosity and national assertiveness, which in turn foments, and is fomented by, the clash of arms. King Edward VII. has taken an honourable lead in wise and brotherly offices of international friendship and courtesy. The President of the French Republic (M. Loubet) has been received with demonstrations of genuine respect and kindliness in a progress through the streets of London, and influential groups of French and English commercial men and legislators have fraternised, and strengthened "l'Entente cordiale," in their respective capitals.

It is not without significance that, within a couple of years of the close of the South African War, the "International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers" has met in Amsterdam. These international gatherings for religious comradeship and the united search for truth, will help, in no small measure, to strengthen the feeling of human solidarity which ignorance and pride forget.

In Ireland also a new day of hope and appeasement would appear to have dawned.

The prospect of another Fiscal controversy threatens to revive jealousies and dissensions by balancing the supposed commercial "interests" of nation against nation, and land against land. Your Committee venture to express the earnest hope that amidst the discussion of "tariffs," "preferences," "retaliation" and the rest, the great landmarks of international solidarity, mutual dependence, commercial probity and social justice, will not be lost sight of. A commercial system based on mutual suspicion, and hostile tariffs, is as much opposed to ethical principle as it is to the best traditions of our national development.

The Eastern Question has again become acute with the revolt of the subjects of the Turk in Macedonia, and the daily record of cruelty and slaughter becomes more and more terrible. It rests with those who believe in civil and religious liberty to press upon the Government the responsibility of the nation in this matter.

Weaker Races.

(2) The question of the relation of the stronger to the weaker civilisations is always with us, though in changing forms and with changing stress. At present the contact between white and black races presents a series of appalling problems which we cannot ignore.

Patriotic Americans are beginning to feel that the negro problem threatens the very bases of their civilisation; the terrible reports that come to us from the Congo Free State fill some of us with horror, and all of us with uneasiness; and recent years have largely increased our own direct responsibilities in South Africa.

Wherever a white minority rules over a black majority the situation has its difficulties of every kind; where, as in South Africa, the whites professedly rule, not, as in India, as the responsible guardians of their subjects but as their industrial superiors, fresh dangers are introduced; and where we are not dealing with self-governing colonies but with Crown possessions our own responsibility is direct and not to be escaped. It is vain for us to plead the difficulties of gaining an adequate knowledge of the facts, or forming a sound judgment upon them when ascertained, for we have deliberately assumed the responsibility and must face it as best we may.

The root fact of the situation in such regions as a large part of our possessions in South Africa is, that we neither went there nor stay there for the sake of the natives, and are not the political administrators of the country on their behalf. This becomes startlingly clear when we consider the principles on which we guide our conduct when we are in that position, e.g., in the Basuto Reserve, where we allow no prospecting for minerals, and strictly regulate the admission of white men, in the interests of the natives. Elsewhere we are there for the sake of industrial gain, and we look upon the natives primarily as constituting one of the elements that must enter into that pursuit.

In this there is nothing in itself discreditable; but it offers no guarantee against the terrible abuses which history continuously shows may arise where an advanced and a backward civilisation clash. Commercial enterprise is seldom sensitive as to the effect of its methods upon the human material it employs; and our own Factory Acts are the standing proof that even in the full blaze of publicity, and when the operatives are people of our own race, we cannot trust to the clash of commercial interests, or even to the play of the domestic affections, to defend the weak or restrain the strong. What, then, is the measure of the vigilance we must exercise if we are to discharge ourselves of our responsibilities towards the toilers of our Crown possessions in South Africa, where differences of race only too readily breed callousness or contempt, where public opinion is dominated by the very interests that have to be controlled, and where it is only with the utmost difficulty that such sufferings or injustices as occur can find a voice? The fact is universally recognised that public opinion at home does directly and indirectly act as a powerful check upon those in our colonies, and in subject countries, who are not sufficiently restrained by their own sense of justice from tyranny and cruelty, and that it supports those who are endeavouring to raise the status of the native races. And we would press earnestly upon our own countrymen the solemn duty of maintaining a body of public opinion here at home in support of those devoted men who take upon themselves the task of championing the cause of our Black fellow subjects.

Education.

(3) When Mr. W. J. Fox introduced his Bill into the House of Commons in 1850 for establishing the education of this country upon a sound and wide basis, there seemed at last a prospect of the nation seriously undertaking this duty towards its children. Fox, like many others, found himself before his time, and twenty years were to pass before Forster, backed this time by a sympathetic House of Commons, was able to pass into law a measure based almost in its entirety upon the one which Fox had failed to persuade the country to adopt. Unfortunately, from the very beginning of the School Board System, there has been a certain antagonism between the established Church and the great Dissenting bodies, as to what kind of religious instruction should be given in the Board Schools. For the last thirty years nearly every School Board election has been fought as though the issue were which shall have the predominance on the Boards, Church or Chapel. Needless to say that in the majority of cases the true education of the children has suffered. The Church of England has resisted the School Boards, and has striven hard to preserve her schools for the use of her children. In many cases the schools, teachers, and scholars have been starved. To remedy this the Bill of 1902 was passed by a House largely composed of sympathisers with the Church. The measure will mean better equipment for thousands of schools and better salaries for the teachers. But the measure does not give direct public control over the money spent. This is its special defect. It places funds in the hands of men, who in many cases will use them for sectarian purposes, and who will be free from control. The orthodox Dissenters have seized upon this point, and throughout the country there has arisen among them a strong determination not to pay for teaching which is contrary to their beliefs. The passive resistance movement is spreading far and wide. Religious people who paid taxes for what they firmly believed to be an unrighteous war, now refuse to pay the new Education Rate. People who for thirty years have had their own doctrines taught at the expense of the State, now find their consciences will not allow them to rest in peace while the Church of England seems to be gaining some advantage over the orthodox Dissenters. And so all England is in a ferment, and nothing is heard of except the terrible dangers of this or that "ism," while the education of the child is forgotten.

There appears to be a growing opinion that the only way out of the controversy, which for so long has retarded true education, lies in the direction of secular education, leaving to the parents first, and the parsons next, the duty of training the children in religion.

The total exclusion of religion from day schools may be the temporary solution of the difficulty, but in a nation which has always been earnest and sincere in its religious beliefs, whatever they may have been, it can scarcely be final. We look for a national system of education based upon the broadest foundation, in which every child shall have equality of opportunity so to develop its powers that ultimately its abilities, trained by earnest teachers, shall be placed at the service of the community, and inspired by that religion which shall be the ultimate outcome of Freedom, Reverence and Devotion.

Condition of the People.

(4) The publication of Mr. Seebohm Rowntree's "Poverty, a Study of Town Life" (in York), and the conclusion of Mr. Charles Booth's seventeen years' investigation into the Life and Labour of London, have directed definite and emphatic attention upon the moral conditions of our town population.

Whether the facts be taken from the provinces or the Metropolis, there is a general and painful, yet hopeful, agreement in the conclusions which they enforce. According to both investigators there is less overcrowding, less drunkenness, less improvidence, less ignorance, less cruelty to animals than ten years since; but more gambling, more foul language, more rush for amusements, more drinking by women, and less enthusiam in the temperance campaign.

Much then has been done, but it is as yet but the light which makes the darkness seen. What remains to be done, and who are to do it?

Mr. Booth draws his own moral, albeit somewhat general: "What is needed is more vigorous life in every direction: social, educational, industrial, political, and religious." We are here most concerned with our religious responsibilities, the duties of the churches. This year has also witnessed the results of the Daily News Census of Church Attendance in London, together with the deductions of the enumerator from his own statistics. One of these touches our inquiry very closely. He says:—

> If the Churches are to be loved they must lead. They must be in the van, not the rear, of progress, if they are to be believed in. That gospel which does not concern itself with man's body, mind and environment, as well as his soul, is a contradiction in terms, a travesty of truth, a mockery of religion; it is no "good news," and usurps a title to which it has no claim. If we cannot make our politics part of our religion, we have no right to cast even a vote. If we cannot take our Christianity into a Borough Council we ourselves ought to remain outside. If the message we believe in does not rank us in eternal, vehement opposition against the sweater, the slum landlord, the trafficker in human lives, we need not expect the masses to take seriously either it or us. If cleaner streets, better housing, sweeter homes, do not come within the scope of our aim, neither will those who are convinced that they have a right to these things come within the shadow of our places of worship."

That implied rebuke may also be an encouragement. According to Mr. Booth the great main fact to which there is endless testimony is that "Christian people are nearly all temperate and thrifty, and the better in every way for being so."

It has been suggested that preachers should now give the Old Book a rest and take Mr. Booth's conclusions as subjects for sermons for the next six months. The comparison is invidious and needless, but the moral is this: It is upon the churches and their members that the duty first falls of improving the moral condition of our towns.

To draw people to our services and into our buildings by religious appeals is a perfectly proper enterprise; but to arouse a keen Christian conscience and a quick civil sense amongst the whole populace is a yet higher, if more difficult, endeavour. Let the two go together, and let the opportunity never be passed by of observing Citizen Sunday.

Gambling.

(5) Last year your Committee gave a short statement of the more important recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the "increase in public gambling."

In April Lord Davey introduced a Bill, based upon the recommendations of that report. The first object of the Bill was to make the Betting Act of 1853 effective at the present time by including under it the carrying on of a betting business by means of the post, telegraph, telephone and other agencies, which were not contemplated when the Act was passed, and which now make it possible for bookmakers to carry on an enormous business, most lucrative to them and most injurious to the community, without bringing themselves within reach of the law. It also provided the penalty of imprisonment for street betting in the case of those who were not to be deterred by repeated fines. And it provided the penalty of imprisonment for those who made bets in the street, or a public place, with children under sixteen years of age. It also provided power to the proprietors or persons having control of any ground where sports were being held, to prohibit betting on the ground, and to remove offenders against such prohibition. The Bill was rejected on the second reading by a majority of forty-eight to thirty-nine. Lord Durham, Chairman of the Committee, led the opposition to the Bill, stating that it would interfere with the amusements of their less fortunate brethren, and prohibit a form of excitement which tends to alleviate the monotony of their lives.

It is not likely that after the report of the Committee and the defeat of this Bill the matter will drop. An evil so great as the wide-spread gambling of the present day cannot be ignored; and, while it may be largely discouraged by private agencies, it is becoming increasingly evident that those who make this evil a profitable business for themselves must be restrained by law. The present system of fines for offences against the Betting Laws merely amounts, in the long run, to a charge of a very small commission on the bookmaker's gains. It is to be hoped that we shall before long have legislators who are not afraid to enact severer penalties for those who are making their living, and in many cases large fortunes, out of this disastrous social evil; and that they will at least be prepared to protect children from them, to give lovers of athletics and genuine sport power to exclude them from their grounds, and to impose such penalties for street betting as shall put an effectual stop to the present notorious defiance of the law.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

The October number of the Hibbert Journal, which begins the second volume, is the strongest which has yet appeared. Four of the articles are by men of quite the first rank among living philosophers. One is by Edward Caird, Master of Balliol, on "St. Paul and Evolution"; the second is by Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, on the "Present Attitude of Reflective Thought towards Religion," which is a continuation of an article by him in the January number; the third is by E. F. Stout, Professor at St. Andrews, on the late F. W. H. Myers' recently published book, "Human Personality and its Survival after Death"; the fourth is by Bernard Bosanquet, also Professor at St. Andrews, on "Plato's Conception of Death." All these articles are exceptionally important and interesting.

The keynote of Dr. Caird's article is struck by the two texts with which he begins, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets; I am not come to destroy but to fulfil"; and from St. Paul, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law . . . that we might receive the promise of the spirit through faith." His article is devoted to the contrast between the two types of thought and character represented by these words. It is the contrast between the Shakespearean and Miltonic type of character, between the large-hearted, sympathetic man of the world and the determined Puritan; the one man reverences the past and loves the present, and desires to see and to bring about a gradual development; the other "cuts the world in two with a hatchet." Old things have passed away; he sees his ideals in antithesis with what has existed. He does not fully recognise all the good in the past, and his work seems to him to consist not so much in development as in re-construction. It is essentially the difference between the spirit of Jesus and of Paul. Dr. Caird recognises, of course, that the spirit of Jesus is the larger and wiser of the two, but he dwells chiefly upon the Pauline or Puritanic type. He shows both the weakness and the value of this type, and brings it, in spite of its apparent opposition, into harmony with the evolutionary theory of the world. "New ideas," he says, "in the first stage of their development can hardly be expressed with sufficient emphasis except by putting them in extreme antagonism to those that are already in the field."

Professor Henry Jones' article takes up the paradox which had been stated in the preceding paper in the January Hibbert. There he had urged that "while this age is more fully committed to intellectual inquiry and more successfully engaged in it than any of its predecessors, it is at the same time more prone to doubt and even deny that intellectual inquiry can have any real value in precisely those matters which are best worth knowing."

We believe in morals more than past ages, but we are hopelessly adrift in an attempt to justify them. We believe in religion, but we have no patience with theology. We are characterised, in fact, by much "practical faith in morality and religion," and by extreme "theoretical distrust of the conceptions on which they rest." The danger of this position is evident. Practical faith in morality and religion cannot continue as a mere instinct. Unless it can in some way be justified, our morals and religion will disappear. The popular method of justification by which men think it possible for the lion of agnosticism and the lamb of faith to lie down together is to deny the authority of reason. The province of reason is limited; "the phenomena of spiritual life are not confined to that province." This "is a sceptical defence of religion like Mr. Balfour's, and 'brings peace by making a desert.'" "I am persuaded," says Professor Jones, "that this method of defending morality and religion—i.e., by representing their objects as exceptions to the order set up by reason—is a wrong method, calculated not only to perpetuate the contradiction between the theoretical and practical aspects of our life, but to injure religion in a fatal way. Instead of a theory of their mutual exclusion, I should prefer a theory of their mutual inclusion." The rest of the article is a vindication of the claims of reason against the attempt of the agnostic to confine its operations to the phenomenal side of life. The ordinary educated reader will not find the argument very easy, but the subject is of vital interest, and is treated by a leading thinker so that a reader may well feel that time and trouble will be well spent in understanding it.

Professor Stout's article on Mr. Myers' book must be dealt with in a few words. This book on "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death," treats of a subject of enormous interest, and it has evidently awakened hope in many minds not hitherto much influenced by spiritualism, that some real discovery has been made. We must sorrowfully confess that we believe with Professor Stout that there is no discovery at all. It is simply a large collection of the old unconvincing stories set in a framework of spurious scientific thought. There is an interesting chapter on prismatic rays, but we cannot, for our own part, see why the existence of ultra-violet in visible prismatic rays proves the existence of a kind of ultra-violet or subliminal self. Professor Stout sets himself to find out what Mr. Myers means by the subliminal self. He comes to the conclusion that this subliminal self, on which Mr. Myers' whole theory rests, has no foundation in psychology, and that it is a mere hypothesis for the purpose of explaining events which never happened. Possibly this summary may seem exaggerated because Professor Stout closes by saying he is not himself clear as to the degree of his own scepticism, and he makes some polite and even friendly remarks about Psychical Research and the absurdity of dogmatic denial in regard to communication from departed spirits. Our summary, however, gives the general effect of the article upon our own mind. So much is said about the subliminal self to-day, that it is well worth while to discover under Professor Stout's guidance what it means in psychology, and how very much changed and hypothetical the conception becomes when employed by spiritualists.

The next article, by Canon Cheyne, on Babylon and the Bible, is a learned and rather heavy piece of work, essentially for Old Testament specialists. Then follows an article by Professor Lewis Campbell on "The Morality of Aeschylus," which, with all humility, we must confess does not interest us; it does not even quite convince us that there is any particular reason for its existence.

Professor Bernard Bosänquet's article on "Plato's Conception of Death" is to us the most beautiful and attractive of all the articles in this number. There is a kind of atmosphere of high scholarship and lofty idealism about it which produces an effect that no analysis or description can explain. Plato is supposed to support those who maintain that earthly life is miserable and the body to be despised; he is supposed to have taught that we should desire the freedom and the spirituality which come with death. This is very much opposed to our modern half-truth,

> How good is man's life, the mere living, how fit to employ
> All the heart, and the soul, and the senses, for ever in joy.

Mr. Bosanquet proceeds to consider how far Plato's own teaching makes for this mortifying ideal, and comes to the conclusion that it does not make for it at all. "What we call 'death' depends very much on the point of view, and Plato's meditation of death is not very far removed from Spinoza's meditation of life." "The spirit of both of them is given in the blunt phrase of Lewis Nettleship, 'Don't bother about death, it doesn't count.'"

But we cannot possibly do justice to Mr. Bosanquet by any extracts or description. His article has something of the same kind of effect on us as an essay of Pater or of Nettleship. There is the spirit of Plato in it, and wherever that spirit dwells there is a sense of beauty and peace.

In conclusion we can only refer very shortly to two of the many excellent reviews. Rev. R. T. Herford writes a review of the Old Testament section of the fourth volume of the "Encyclopædia Biblica." We confess to a particular liking for his style and method. His scholarship is beyond question, but he is not heavy; his learning is known to many already; and when his book on "Talmudic References to Christianity" appears next month, we believe that he will be known to the world as one of the foremost Hebraists of his time.

Mrs. Humphry Ward has a most stimulating review of "Studies in Theology," by Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Wicksteed.

It cannot be too plainly emphasised that what we are now witnessing in the religious life around us is the emergence of a fresh religious conception, exercising the same thrilling and vivifying power as the older beliefs in Incarnation and Sacrament. For large numbers of religious minds, conscience has become, has taken the place of, revelation. . . . Of this transformation, as one might phrase it, of "reason" into "enthusiasm," this new book of Oxford Essays is an interesting example.

Mrs. Ward, as always, looks at our thought and our churches in the light of the general movements of the time. She does not think of us as a little or decaying force. This article is especially to be recommended to any members or ministers of our Free Churches who are inclined to be discouraged by the difficulties with which we meet and the smallness of our work.

We always feel, as we feel very strongly in this article, that there is no more friendly, stimulating, and helpful critic of the life and thought of our Free Churches than Mrs. Humphry Ward.

THE SYROPHŒNICIAN WOMAN.

THE story of the Syrophœnician woman is not only a difficulty in the way of our devoted honour for Jesus if taken as it stands, it is also an historical incongruity. Whatever his position towards the Gentiles may have been, he surely was not an exceptionally narrow-minded Jew. And it is incongruous with his humanity of feeling to suppose that he would have dismissed a suffering woman, appealing to his compassion, with contempt or downright insult.

Some commentators have accordingly regarded the whole story as an invention. But there is no ground for that supposition, except the historical improbability of the narrative. And there is no necessity for resorting to it. A small alteration in the account in the Gospel according to Mark (vii. 24–30), which is justifiable by general critical probabilities, removes the whole difficulty; and gives us a story that commends itself strongly to our acceptance by its naturalness, its inner consistency and originality, and its agreement with what we know of Jesus and of the circumstances. All that is necessary is to omit the second half of verse 27: "For it is not becoming (καλόν) to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs."

There is a reason for making that omission on general grounds of literary criticism, quite apart from moral or religious objections. It is inherently probable that as the story was told, the leading words, the pivot of the dialogue, would be assigned to Jesus, rather than be left to an unknown woman. And at the same time, when they are taken from him, the connection of thought is more subtle and more logical.

Jesus says, for a reason to be noticed presently, "Let the children first be satisfied." And the woman replies, "Yes, sir; and the little dogs (κυνάρια) under the table eat of the children's crumbs." So that, although the children are fed first, the little dogs can get their share without waiting. Jesus need not have been thinking about dogs at all, but of the children of the household of Israel. But his words afforded an opening for the woman's ingenuity, prompted by her mother-love as well as her mother-wit.

We have still to ask why Jesus should have tried to dismiss the woman's appeal in any such way. The key lies in a single word. "The woman was Ἑλληνίς," a Greek or Gentile woman. She could not have had the moral and spiritual faith that he required. She could only have known of him as a wonder worker who might heal her daughter.

It was quite contrary to his principle and practice to encourage that idea. The woman had to be dismissed. And it was simply impossible for him to explain to her his reasons. His own disciples scarcely understood them. He was placed in a very painful position. And what could he say? I cannot think of anything better under the circumstances, anything gentler and more tactful, than that the children must be served first; perhaps after he had said, as reported in Matthew, "I was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

And when the woman ingeniously turned his words of refusal into a reason for granting her request, clinging to her hope with motherly persistency, his objection was overcome, and he did for her what he could.

It may have been a prayer for the daughter's healing, as the words in Matthew might be taken; or an assurance that she was healed, as in Mark. Or I venture to surmise that he may have gone with the woman to exercise his calming and healing power.

This way of removing the difficulty—a difficulty for history as well as religion—appears to me justifiable on critical grounds, and it not only clears the character of Jesus from an ugly stain, but also gives us a natural and life-like incident which powerfully commends itself as true.

A HOLIDAY PILGRIMAGE.

Being on the Lake of Lucerne this autumn, and noting a concourse of pilgrims in the neighbourhood, one heard of an annual pilgrimage on September 14, to the wonder-working shrine of the Virgin Mary at Einsiedeln, from which those we had noticed were evidently returning. Further inquiries elicited the fact that an excursion thither was full of interest, and therefore, on a beautiful September morning there started from Brunnen four hale and hearty pilgrims. These pilgrims, clad in no robes of distinction, carried each an oaken staff well shod with iron spike, and were burdened with nothing more serious than the indispensable kodak, and a knapsack containing the usual "pension" lunch of sandwiches, hard boiled eggs, fruit, and a neat little paper screw of salt. The journey (by train) first lay through the valleys of Schwyz and Goldau, then, changing trains, ascended through the wooded valley of the Steiner-Aa, with many a glimpse of hill and mountain, until a broad green pastured valley is entered, some 3,000 feet above sea level, at the head of which stands the town dominated by the abbey with its slender twin towers.

The approach to the abbey is through a large square, flanked by two semi-circular arcades, where there are stalls for sale of rosaries, images, models, and, of course, the inevitable picture post-card. In the centre of this square is a black marble fountain with fourteen jets from which the pilgrims drink, and, as we watch, a row of nuns file by, each taking possession of a jet. The foundation of the place is "attributed to Count Meinrad of Sulgen"—so runs the story from that useful mine of information, Baedeker—"who built a chapel here in honour of a wonder-working image of the Virgin, presented to him by the Abbess Hildegard of Zurich. After Meinrad's death in 861, a monastery of Benedictine Hermits (Einsiedler) sprang up here. In 1274 it was created an independent principality by Emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg, and owing to the ever increasing throng of pilgrims, it soon vied with St. Gallen as one of the richest monasteries of Switzerland."

Entering the abbey itself, we see in the nave the chapel, built of black marble, within which the famous image is dimly perceived through a grating, covered with crowns of gold and jewels and rich drapings. Around it are kneeling people of all ranks and conditions—nuns, peasants, beggars, and gentlefolk—their lips moving in repeated prayer. A priest passes in to trim the lamp on the altar, and as he opens the side door of the chapel, there presses at the threshold, to be, if possible, closer to the shrine, a poor peasant girl on whose face trouble is writ large, and whose earnest gaze on the image makes one hope, at least for her, that she can find the consolation so urgently needed. As we watch this scene, the image, with its black face, appears to our emancipated minds repulsive even to the extreme of being ludicrous, were it not for the reverent devotion of the worshippers, and one cannot help contrasting the strength of the faith itself with the object of its adoration.

The rest of the church, with its gaudy pictures and gilding, calls for little comment beyond our admiration for a beautiful ironwork railed screen separating the nave from the choir, in which receding effects are marvellously rendered; and a magnificent chandelier presented by Napoleon III.

Then followed a short visit to the monastery, from which the feminine element of our party was excluded, much to their indignation. Here is a library of some 50,000 volumes, and manuscripts of which Manchester College might well be covetous, but courtesy (or, shall I say, fear of the before-mentioned indignation?) compels us to cut our inspection very short. We pass hurriedly through refectory, music room, fitted with specimens of the brothers' own carving, private chapel, and through long stone passages running the whole length of the building, where some of the brothers are walking, some for exercise and some with book in hand for study, looking as we go into the brothers' cells on either side, and finally spying from a window a group of novices enjoying a mundane game of ninepins in an adjoining barn.

Au reste, how we soothed our friends of the (so-called) weaker sex with the cup that cheers, &c., how we nearly missed our return train, how our amateur photographer distinguished himself by trying to take a time exposure with an ox-cart crossing the square at a steady walk, these are only the details of everyday life that relieve monotony and vary the labours even of a self-imposed pilgrimage.

GREENWICH THEATRE SERVICE.

The first of a series of four popular Sunday evening services was held on Sunday last at the Carlton Theatre, Greenwich. These services have been organised by the committee of the London District Unitarian Society, in pursuance of the scheme of extended work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Last Sunday evening was unfortunately very wet. High-street, Greenwich, is not attractive at the best of times. That night it was positively repellent, and to add to the discomfort, part of the tramway was "up." However, the Carlton Theatre is not difficult to find, and though not large or in any way sumptuous, it is sufficiently comfortable, and easily held all who ventured out on such a night.

Inside the theatre there was nothing cheerless. The little red lamps, the red walls and benches gave a cheerful glow to the faces of the audience, while an attempt had been made to set a scene at the back of the stage that should be in keeping with the purpose for which the theatre that night was being used. In front of the stage there was a row of plants, to right and left of the preacher's table sat a choir of ten, and in the orchestra there was a band, both choir and band adding greatly to the effectiveness of the service. The band aided but did not drown the voices, and the choir led but did not by any means monopolise the singing, in which the bulk of the audience joined most heartily.

Who in Greenwich would be sufficiently interested in the Unitarian message to turn out on such a night? Looking at some 250 to 300 faces that fronted the platform, about half filling the pit and lower gallery, one seemed to recognise that they were much the same class of young men and women that you would find in any East London chapel or mission hall. People who are for the most part in the habit of going to some place of worship, only they had come here for a change, attracted, perhaps, by Mr. Page Hopps' name, or, may be, by the novelty of having a service in a theatre. Were the people interested? Yes, if hearty participation in the service, perfect quiet and attention during the address, and the appreciative comments one heard at the close of the service denote interest.

Indeed, a little more noise inside might have drowned the rattle of the pitiless rain on the roof, and the shuffle of scurrying feet, and the dejected tinkle of the bells on the sodden tram horses, which every now and then came in through the opening door at the back of the auditorium.

That glimpse of damp and dejection seen through the door made a curious commentary to Mr. Hopps' inspiring message of the true destiny of man here and hereafter!

Next Sunday, it is to be hoped, the atmospheric conditions will be more favourable. If so, there should be a large attendance, and the little band of stewards will need reinforcement. Perhaps, too, our literature may be a little more in evidence, and it may be made more apparent who are responsible for the movement, and what churches they have in the South and East of London. The willing help which was rendered by choir and stewards deserves recognition. The most practical form of recognition would be more helpers from Peckham, say, or Plumstead, Lewisham, or Brixton, to come to their aid.

The service was simple and appropriate; a few opening words of welcome and of thanks to those who had come—of invitation to come for the whole course, and to bring their friends, followed by the singing of "Come, let us join with faithful souls," the musical setting of which appeared to be familiar to the audience, if the words were new. Then came, as first lesson, the parable of the Prodigal Son, then "Nearer, my God, to Thee," after which Mr. Hopps read a short poem by an American author, enforcing the essential sameness of the idea of God, in whatsoever form or under whatsoever name that idea might be expressed. Another hymn preceded the address, which was entitled "Man's destiny here and hereafter." Mr. Hopps began by emphasising the vital importance of his subject to all, the necessity of serious thought upon the subject, whether by young people or by those who are called working people. He claimed it to be the greatest of all questions, and the one which most intimately concerned each one of his hearers. What, he asked, were the alternatives we had to face? Was life here a matter of mere chance and tragic chaos, of conflicting and purposeless forces, or did it manifest a law of progress, of evolution, of development from rude and imperfect beginnings to ever more complete realisation?

Did the laws of life here, if such laws there be, equally apply to life hereafter? was the hereafter annihilation—in other words, was there no hereafter—or did that law of evolution go onward beyond the change called death, with ever widening opportunity for progress? Did death mark the end of the period of development, and was it followed by a fixed fate, eternal bliss or everlasting torment, heaven or hell?

The answers to these questions were based on historical and scientific evidence, which showed the inference to be overwhelming in support of belief, not in man's fall and degeneration, but in a mighty process of development and unfolding going on, with ebb and flow, perhaps, yet going on ceaselessly throughout the ages. May we not claim, then, as man's future destiny, to be borne ever onward by the tide of God to higher and more perfect states? Out of the life of the beast has been developed that of man, out of the desolating war of self-interest has grown the dream of helpful universal brotherhood, out of the wild rule of might the sense of restraining justice. May we not claim that the poetic dream of the coming of God's Kingdom is a reality, based upon sober scientific fact; improvement ever leaving open a place for penitence for past mistakes, for unfolding and developing what is good. Evil can pass utterly away. The power to improve is indestructible. Work, then, Mr. Hopps concluded, for the best things of life, full of confidence and hope; strive ever to fit yourselves for the splendid change, the destiny of man that is to come!

Next Sunday Mr. Hopps' subject is "The Call of God to Man."

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

III.—THE HIGHER RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Matthew v. 13—48.

WE know now from the Beatitudes something of Christ's idea of a good man; what he thought men would be, if once God reigned in their hearts as King. Such men, he said, would be "the salt of the earth," and keep things fresh and wholesome; they would be "the light of the world," and make things bright and clear. They would "shine before men," not to attract attention to themselves, but to give light; like a lamp, which is set upon a stand, not to be seen, but to help others to see. With more light to help them, men would be more ready to glorify the Father in heaven.

After speaking in this way of character, Jesus went on to speak of conduct. The rest of the chapter tells us what goodness is in practice. It is called "righteousness." The "righteousness" of disciples is to be better than the "righteousness" of scribes and Pharisees. What does this mean? Who were the scribes and Pharisees?

The scribes were the teachers and interpreters of the Old Law. For that reason they were sometimes called Lawyers—men learned in the Law. The Pharisees were those admirers and followers of the scribes who bound themselves by vows to carry out and practise what they taught. In many ways they were very good men. As one of them rightly said (Luke xviii. 11, 12), they were not extortioners, and not unjust, and they gave a tenth part of everything they had for use in the Temple, and for the poor. But their goodness was not good enough, for it was too much the goodness of outward act, and too little the goodness of inward thought and feeling. Jesus was fond of saying (as in vii. 16, 17) that a good man is like a good tree—good right through. The fruit of a good tree is good, and so is the whole tree, down to the very roots. Good men, in the same way, are good throughout—not only in that which is outward and visible, but also in that which is inward and invisible. Under the Old Law people had thought too much of the letter of each commandment, and too little of the spirit. The first thing that Jesus did was to take some of these commandments, and to show their true meaning and intention. We can make this clearer by putting them down, first, as they stood in the Old Law, and then as he brought them under the New Commandment.

LEGAL RIGHTEOUSNESS.

1. Thou shalt not kill. (Exod. xx. 13).
2. Thou shalt not commit adultery. (Exod. xx. 14.)
3. Thou shalt not forswear thyself. (Exod. xx. 7.)
4. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth. (Exod. xxi. 24.)
5. Love thy neighbour (and hate thine enemy). (Levit. xix. 18.)

MORAL RIGHTEOUSNESS.

1. Be not angry.
2. Be not unclean, even in thought.
3. Swear not at all.
4. Resist not evil.
5. Love your enemies.

This is how Jesus explains and commends the new teaching:—

1. ANGER. There are, he says, three kinds of anger; (1) Malice (causeless anger); (2) the anger of Contempt ("Raca"); (3) the anger of Condemnation ("Fool"); and they ought to be thought just as wrong before God as the offences which are tried in the local court ("the judgement"), or in the central court ("the council"), or are left to God to punish after death ("Gehenna of fire").

2. UNCLEANNESS. Temptation to unclean thought or wish must be put away, even if the putting away be as painful as the plucking out of an eye, or the cutting off of a hand; for thoughts and wishes are inward actions, although they are not outward acts.

3. SWEARING. God is everywhere, and you are just as much in His presence, and you are doing just as solemn a thing, when you say, "Yes," or "No," as when you take an oath before Him.

4. NON-RESISTANCE TO EVIL. Put up with wrong done to you personally, if it is a matter which concerns you only. Overcome evil with good. For instance, (1) Stand a second blow, rather than return the first; (2) Let a creditor have more than his due, rather than have a quarrel with him; (3) Meet a public claim upon you twice over, rather than meet it once unwillingly. In the same way, with regard to private gifts and loans, it is better to grant an unreasonable request, (compare Luke vi. 30), than ungraciously to refuse it.

5. THE LOVE OF THE ENEMY. There is no particular goodness in loving those who love you. The worst of men do this. Try to act as God acts. He makes his sun to rise, his rain to fall, on the evil and the good, on the just and the unjust. If God has no "enemies," His children should have none. If other men hate us, we need not hate them; in fact, we can, if we choose, do the very opposite, "salute" them, "bless" them, "pray" for them. A Jewish salutation in those days was a blessing and a prayer.

COUNSELS OF PERFECTION.

It is sometimes said that all this is very good, but quite beyond our reach. That may be true, but we must not aim at anything less good. The copy given you to write from, and the model given you to draw from, are always better than anything you can do, but, the better they are, the more you admire them and wish to imitate them. In music a true note is perfectly true, and in mathematics a straight line is perfectly straight, and in morals a right action is perfectly right. Perfection is what we aim at when we try to be really and truly the "children" of God. To be perfect is to be fully yourself, to be all that you are capable of being. God is perfect because He is completely Himself, and we are perfect when we go, if we ever do so, to the full length of ourselves. This is what Jesus meant by being perfect, even as the heavenly Father is perfect.

MORLEY'S GLADSTONE.

RARELY has a book been anticipated with so wide or so keen an expectancy as the great Life of GLADSTONE, which made every bookseller in England a busy man last Saturday. Author and subject combined to raise this expectancy to the highest pitch. None but GLADSTONE could provide a biographer with so magnificent a theme. None but MORLEY stood qualified by literary gift and fulness of knowledge to handle the theme on an adequate scale.

It is too soon to pronounce a verdict on the merit of the immense performance which for five years has withdrawn a public man of the highest type from the arena of action and of speech. We shall rejoice in the hope that, released from the burden of his task, the biographer may now once more with potent speech mingle his voice with the political voices of the day. But we shall readily believe that by no platform or parliamentary activity could JOHN MORLEY better have served his country during the lustrum that is passed than by preparing the three great volumes which he has now bestowed upon the world.*

For after five years without GLADSTONE, and in the storm of present controversy, we are able even more vividly to appreciate what the presence of that statesman meant in the public life of England than was possible when for a moment the noise of battle was hushed about his tomb; and we know that more momentous than any political proposals, more grave than any particular political mistakes which these or those among us deplore, is the fact that a certain temper has gone out of English public life which radiated from the personality of the great Minister whose memorial is now before us.

Many earnest and thoughtful citizens found themselves from time to time opposed to the particular views and aims of Mr. GLADSTONE. There were thousands of high-minded and honourable Englishmen who were permanently opposed to his whole theory of right government. He was a strong and strenuous party leader; and all good men were by no means of his party. Many broke away from him, after rendering him their support for years, because they disapproved of proposals which lay very near his heart. But we are persuaded that no man of open heart ever listened to one of his great and historic speeches on Ireland, on Bulgaria, on Armenia, even on the fiscal problems with which he dealt with so extraordinary a lucidity and mastery, without feeling a purifying fire flowing through his veins, a new sense of the moral significance of politics beating at his conscience. This sense of the height of the politician's calling was the supreme contribution of GLADSTONE to the public life of his age. And it is this that with his death has gone from us, thus constituting our incomparable bereavement.

Small religionists are not in the habit of regarding Mr. MORLEY as a religious man. In any case the intellectual framework of his religion is immeasurably diverse from that of the illustrious subject of this book. Yet Mr. MORLEY'S heart beats with warmest sympathy as he indicates the dominance of the religious sentiment and the religious motive throughout the orbit of Mr. GLADSTONE'S career. "Not," says the biographer, "for two centuries, since the historic strife of Anglican and Puritan, had our island produced a ruler in whom the religious motive was paramount in the like degree. He was not only a political force but a moral force. He strove to use all the powers of his own genius and the powers of the State for moral purposes and religious." And again: "It was religious motive that, through a thousand avenues and channels, stirred him and guided him in his whole conception of active social duty." "Life was to him in all its aspects an application of Christian teaching and example." And what fairer picture have we of an aged politician's inner life than that revealed in the sentences which Gladstone wrote in his diary, sitting in the Temple of Peace, as the last hours of his seventh decade ebbed away? Or what more revealing glimpse than that in a letter to his son on the conduct of life, in which he declares how even amid the distraction or absorption of affairs the mind may be trained to seize opportunities of silent communion with God?

And from the groundwork, the propelling energy, of this supreme religiousness Mr. GLADSTONE spoke and strove and wrought. It penetrated his whole activity. It gave persuasiveness to all his oratory. Not that direct and overt reference was very frequent in his speeches or in his writings, save those dealing of set purpose with religion. But the God in the man gave thrill and power to his words and presence; and hearers were moved by a somewhat which deeply stirred, though it only lay hidden behind the articulated syllables.

And so men hearing him felt a challenge to their moral and spiritual nature, and politics in his handling became an education to men in the loftier elements of life. This is what we have lost; and by that loss England is left immeasurably poor.

Of what statesman now prominent can it be said that he infuses into politics an influence comparable to this? Who makes the same lofty appeal? Who lifts men out of selfishness and self-interest to great issues of humanity? What would Mr. GLADSTONE have said to "retaliation" as a watchword and a policy? How would "Why should not we hit back" have sounded on his lips? Could he ever have so subdued generosity to prudence as to balance nicely the faults of Macedonians against those of Turks while a people was being massacred? Who will sound the note which he would have sounded in this fiscal controversy? He would, indeed, have built up masterly argument on the hard, dry basis of figures. But he would also have had moral imagination enough to recognise as an element of the problem the suffering which our policy may inflict on the dumb proletariate of other nations. Who is there to-day who has a thought for the farmers and peasantry of Denmark whom by a stroke of the pen our chancelleries may ruin? Mr. GLADSTONE made commercial treaty, wise or unwise, with France; but his pleasure was quite as much that he believed that it would bring prosperity to the husbandmen in the vineyards round Bordeaux as that it would add to the wealth and comfort of his countrymen. To-day we hear much political reasoning sound and unsound, much advocacy scrupulous and unscrupulous; but who speaks charged with the spirit of an all-embracing humanity? To whom can we listen and come away, saying each in his heart, "I am a better man because the spirit of a great servant of God has touched my spirit?"

Many of those who in the old days gathered under the Gladstone banner, have been reproached since then with the epithet of "Little Englanders." It is true that they take little pride in the mere laying of mile to mile and territory to territory. But some of them long with a passionate longing for a revival of a sense of the greatness of England such as inspired the mighty statesman who was a terror through long years to every tyrant in Europe. They long for the rise of politicians who will revive and re-energise the splendid tradition which held England's greatness to lie in her leadership among the nations in the cause of freedom, of amity, and of justice. In this lay GLADSTONE'S pride as patriot and ruler of cabinets and parliaments. To this his biographer would call us back. No English Minister ever had a fuller consciousness of the importance of wise and sound finance than GLADSTONE. But he knew that there were other matters even more momentous for the welfare of a nation. May the perusal of the story of his life help the rekindling of his spirit over the length and breadth of the land he loved so well and so superbly served.

BY THE REV. E. P. BARROW.

THE term "Domestic," which still holds its place in our official title and description, does undoubtedly give prominence to a particular method of missionary work. It points to the home as the special field of this particular mission, and it is part of its history that in the home the Manchester Domestic Mission began its work. The missionary seems to have set himself rather to restore the lapsed and the scattered than to re-organise them. Out of ministration in the home, however, there grew—it is easy to see how—a ministry in chapel and school. A later development came with the growth of clubs and societies for the promotion of thrift, of friendly intercourse, of wholesome amusement, and so on. It may be said, therefore, that the original purpose, to meet a particular need, has, to a certain extent, become less distinctive, and that there is little now to mark off our mission stations from churches of the ordinary type, with their Sunday-schools and kindred institutions. The question then arises: "Does a mission-church as effectively meet that particular need, to deal with which the Domestic Mission—a mission without a church—was instituted?

I am bound to say that in certain quarters the mission-church, as an agency for raising the life of the very poor, is falling out of favour. There is an increasing number of churchmen who seriously question its value. Why, they ask, should the word "mission" be connected only with certain neighbourhoods, and with a certain class of the population? It carries in itself a kind of reproach, which was not felt in the old days, when the social gulf between richer and poorer fellow-citizens was more fixed than it is now, and the then uneducated poor were thought of as heathens at home, to whom the Gospel had never been preached. Apart from Mr. Booth's comments upon mission-churches of all denominations in London, I have read other accounts written in a similar strain.

The People to be reached:

My own feeling is, I confess, that a mission-church must in time suffer, as all churches suffer, from its own respectability. There are thousands upon thousands of the labouring class around us who are not ready for religious association, cannot possibly take part in collective worship. A sense of awkwardness and incapacity is of itself enough to keep them at a distance. Nor does this apply only to religious services. They cannot be induced to enter the doors of fixed institutions in which they have not already, as a class, a social standing. We open art-museums and picture-galleries and free libraries and public pleasure-grounds, and still it remains a question of habit and tradition—a question also of manners and of clothes—who shall enter, and who shall stay away. I think we sometimes forget that every society which aims at improvement aims at a rising standard, but a rising standard also acts—it cannot be helped—in the direction of exclusiveness. Attendance at anything—service or lecture or entertainment—is to countless folk, in a way that we cannot understand, a public appearance which they cannot bring themselves to face. The social divisions of the poor are as petty as our own, and their sensibilities, unfortunately, are even more acute. When the girl in a hat edges away from the girl in a shawl, there will not be room in the same building for both; one must go, and we know which is more likely to remain. There is a process of selection, a kind of natural law, by which all societies establish their own character, and draw their own line, and the area of their influence is at last the area of their own recognised membership. An evangelising, as distinct from an organising influence, on the other hand, is an influence that is always on the move. It is of the essence of a mission that it should frequently change its ground.

The Missionary Aim.

And this brings us to what is really the root-question of our inquiry. When you speak of missionary aim, do you really mean spiritual regeneration? Do you mean the turning away of the wicked from wickedness? Do you acknowledge any duty in respect of the outcast, the fallen, the criminal? We are always speaking of the drunkenness, the vice, the unpunished, and, in many cases, unpunishable, cruelties and excesses of this great city. Do you want to come to close quarters with them? It is sometimes said that we prevent them. Prevention is very well for the righteous, but it will not call sinners to repentance. Nor is it enough to call them; you must go to them. You must take them on their own ground, catch them at their own time—it may be even in the street at midnight, or at the prison gate in the early morning. All this, of course, is very special work. The question is whether we mean to have any part in it. Missionary methods will depend on missionary aims. What I want to point out is that missionary work is not primarily what is called social work. The social worker who deals with poverty and ignorance and gloom, and unhappy surroundings and unwholesome habits; who sets himself to brighten and refine and humanise the life that is lived in mean streets; is a worker whose work is beyond all praise, but it is very rarely that he can touch—it is not often that he seeks to touch—the individual life, the soul within, the seat of secret temptation and desolating passion; tries to grapple with the moral causes which lie behind poverty and ignorance and helpless misery. The reformation of character, the restoration of the love of goodness and of the thought of God, is work more difficult and more delicate—how difficult and how delicate, only the spiritual worker knows. The choice, then, must be made, and it is part of my contention that social work is best done under that name, and that name only. Directly you connect it with distinctly religious motives, and distinctively religious methods, you do that which is more than likely to narrow the social usefulness, and to reduce the social effect. One branch of the work will hamper and prejudice the other. We may take it as certain that philanthropic effort in future will take the form of the undenominational settlement, rather than that of the denominational mission. The question was raised many years ago, when some of us started Toynbee Hall, and some, as a corrective, subscribed to Oxford House. I do not think I need ask to which side public support has inclined since then. The social settlement has no interests beyond those of the community which it serves. It interferes with nothing, competes with nothing, captures nothing. It has no following to win, or to reward. It may look for helpers and workers to all parties, and to all creeds. In the case of the mission-house, alas! the motive, be it ever so pure, is sure to be misunderstood, and by none more than by the poor themselves. Religious zeal is almost invariably mistaken for religious rivalry.

The Economic Question.

The religious difficulty is not the only problem. There is also the economic question, which must sooner or later be faced. We are told again and again by those who know, that nothing is more responsible for the helplessness of the poor than the unorganised charity of the churches. In a report presented lately to the Rochester Diocesan Conference by a special committee appointed to deal with the subject of almsgiving, the following example was given of the pauperising of a respectable family, in the course of a single year. The head of the family had been disabled by accident, but he found it at last more profitable not to allow himself to recover. This is how it was managed:—

1. Outdoor relief, 5s. a week.
2. Curate, 1s. ticket weekly.
3. Daily school, dinners to children.
4. Ragged School Union, boots for children.
5. Medical Mission, medicine and tickets.
6. Wesleyan Mission, occasional shillings.
7. Baptist Mission, occasional shillings.
8. Primitive Methodist Mission, occasional shillings.
9. District Visitor, tickets.

This is an extreme case, no doubt, but it shows how easily, and how unconsciously, harm can be done by the well-disposed, if they choose to act independently. The ticket system is now said to be as mischievous as the money-dole want of system. Some of the London clergy have for some time been trying to make boards of administration, the clergy themselves and their lay helpers being allowed only to report the cases which come under their notice. They also, in some parishes, work through,

* This paper was read at a special meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission Committee at the Memorial Hall, on Monday, October 5. We are inviting a discussion upon it, in which Domestic Mission Workers and others will take part. The first contributions towards the discussion we shall publish next week.—ED. INQUIRER.

and with, the Charity Organisation Society. This is a right movement, and a growing movement. We shall have to consider before long whether we will fall in with it. Nor is it merely an economic question.

Minister without Money.

It is not simply a case of overlapping. A very serious principle is involved. I have myself for many years felt very strongly that, for the sake of popular religion, there ought to be in the minds of the people no connection between spiritual ministration and charitable distribution. There is nothing which breeds more suspicion—on the part of the minister, on the part of those who are ministered to, and on the part of those who independently hold aloof. It is an old trouble—as old as Christianity itself—the coming in of ministration to material wants as a stumbling-block and offence to the ministry of the word. The modern missionary, like the old, must learn to take no money in his purse. He will have a wider welcome, and a deeper influence, in the end. The springs of charity will not dry up when the clergy are no longer the channels of distribution. They will flow more evenly, more regularly, and more bountifully, when they flow over larger administrative areas, and are guided by the hands of those who are wise enough not to trust their own unaided judgment, and have no mutual jealousies to keep them from co-operation.

Influence of Residence.

I must touch upon another point, and in doing so may excite some opposition, but I venture to claim some of that freedom of statement which is presently to be allowed in discussion. Our missions are what have been called lock-up missions. The missionaries are non-resident. But residence is, of all the appeals they can make, the strongest. It is one thing to "work" amongst the poor, and another to be content to live with them, cut off from your own class, enduring the same conditions with them, day and night, and all through the year. An unsteady mortal once said to a clerical visitor: "If you lived in this court, you would want the whisky too" The only unanswerable answer to that is to live in the court, without the whisky. We can all talk about the life which rises superior to base surroundings; show how it is done, or else remain an unconvincing preacher, like the rest of us. Even in social settlements residence is thought to be desirable, if not indispensable.

Encourage Independence.

To come now, to a conclusion. Our missionaries, as we know, and as our report says, are faithfully maintaining that which they have received—maintaining it under difficulties and discouragements enough to try the stoutest hearts—but that which they have received, and hold, is not the plastic thing it once was. It has settled into definite, permanent form, and that form claims nearly all their attention. They are practically in the position of ministers of churches provided for the poor. I do not myself believe in provided churches of any kind. The growth of a working-class church ought to be as spontaneous, and its management as free, as the growth and management of a working-class trade-union. It must think and act and provide for itself, to be in any real sense a living church. The parting of the ways must, therefore, some day come. You cannot keep even a supported congregation for ever in leading strings, and then, with self-government, the question will arise: "In what sense can a self-governing congregation remain, and be described, as a 'mission?'" The old idea of Domestic Mission has a great deal to commend it. The church in the house is, after all, the main thing. We are constantly reminded of the breaking down of family life in the homes of the poor, of the decline of parental control, of the weakening of the sense of parental responsibility, of the weakening also of care and responsibility, on the part of children, for aged parents. Here is our field. How much might be done for the reconstruction of the family, not through one man, not through official or semi-official visitors, but through families themselves, grouped together, and pledged one to another to live by rule and plan! What is sadly wanted is co-operative moral movement amongst the poor, on their own behalf. Rouse them to fresh endeavours of their own. We make too many arrangements for them, take too many things out of their hands, treat them as if they could do nothing for themselves, and so, alert and active and watchful enough in matters of mere livelihood, in the higher interests of life they are lacking in spirit and ambition. Show them how to organise themselves. Let them be their own missioners, one to another. Whatever is done, let them be, as far as is possible, the doers of it.

The People's Salvation.

I can imagine that the next great religious movement in this country may be out of the line of church movement altogether. The Salvation Army is right in making the poor ministers to the poor. In their religious services at head-quarters you see their weakness; in their street-to-street and house-to-house visitation, you see their strength. The mass of the people must work out its own salvation. A class rises only when it makes fresh opinion, and raises new standards of action for itself. I quite admit that a mission-church, without touching the life of the very poor—a wandering, shy, unsettled class, very hard to deal with—may yet very sensibly affect the life of a whole neighbourhood, and communicate something of its influence through those whom it does reach. But, where the primary qualities of self-respect and self-reliance are wanting, I doubt if you can implant them without special treatment and personal appeal. To rescue, to reclaim, to save, generalities and general opportunities are of no use; you must deal with unit, the the individual case. That is peculiarly missionary work, whether clerical or lay.

Do not think that I speak simply as a theorist and idle critic of other men's labours. I have had just practical experience enough to know something of their difficulties. I began my ministerial work in a very poor city parish. I have taken part in mission services in the south, and in special work in the Black Country, and, oddly enough, in a Lancashire town, nearly thirty years ago. As a member of a Board of Guardians, I have made some study of systems of relief and charity administration. In Manchester, in one connection and another, I have seen something of the life of the poor in some of the poorest districts. I have not seen enough, or done enough, to be in any way an authority. The shaping of the missions is in your hands, not in mine. But I think it is good for all who are entrusted with management, from time to time to take their eyes off the details of the work they have in hand, and to look at it broadly, and in the light of fresh conclusions. I give my reflections for what they are worth. No harm will be done, and no one, I am sure, will be offended, if those who follow me will do the same.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

On Wednesday the fifteenth annual meeting of this Assembly was held at Highgate Unitarian Christian Church. There was a large attendance of ministers and delegates.

Service and Sermon.

The service was conducted by the Rev. S. Gardner Preston (Hastings), whose readings were taken from the prophecies of Isaiah and 1 Corinthians. Five hymns were sung, and if the volume of sound be a proof, the service certainly gathered inspiration as it proceeded, the concluding hymn—Alford's "Forward be our watchword"—being given with special vigour. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. J. Marten (Horsham) in a quiet, impressive manner, which greatly commended his argument. Taking as his text 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18, "The Lord is the Spirit," &c., the preacher modestly disclaimed the attempt to bring out of his "treasure" anything "new," but expressed a hope that it would be useful if he but recalled to remembrance some of the contents and implications of those principles of liberty in matters spiritual to which their churches were attached. They had, no doubt, a variety of names, but all were attached to Free Christianity; and while some of those present preferred titles of closer definition, this attachment was confessed by all. Put negatively, their love of spiritual liberty implied refusal to accept the outward authority of State, Church, or book; but, after all, many others, including men who scoff at all religion, might rightly claim as much freedom as that. The liberty they cherished was such as freed the mind from ignorance and sluggishness. It implied an inward energy, open towards all good influences and alive to whatever makes for righteousness, truth, and love. Some had foreboded of them nothing but decay; but if they exercised this true spiritual liberty it must result in life and growth "from glory to glory." Even in respect of numerical success, respecting which over-anxiety was to be deprecated, he had no doubt of the future growth of their churches if each member were but faithful and patient in doing his own share of the work committed to them. Some had found their theology lacking, but he could not admit that even at the present stage, humble and tentative as it might be, they had a theology to be ashamed of; while, if they steadfastly kept to liberty and intellectual sincerity they could not fail to advance to greater "glory" in the knowledge of divine things. Similarly, he believed that further progress lay before them in the development of ethical principles and their application in personal life, in social affairs, and, finally, in that great field of work for the people at large which had as yet proved beyond the scope not only of their churches, but of all. He encouraged his brethren to trust to liberty for these higher gifts and powers, to be wisely optimist, and so persevere in their good work.

A collection was taken on behalf of the funds of the Assembly, and at the close of the service luncheon was provided in the school-room adjoining the church.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

AFTER lunch the chair was taken by the President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, for the business meeting in the church. The roll of the Assembly was called by the Rev. F. Allen, the Secretary, and on the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. H. Gow, the Acton Unitarian Church and All Souls' Free Church, Child's Hill, were received into the Assembly.

The PRESIDENT, on behalf of the members, expressed warm indebtedness to the Rev. J. J. Marten for his sermon.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON, presenting the accounts as Treasurer, stated that the morning's collection had amounted to £14 7s. 10d. He made an earnest appeal for more financial aid for Walthamstow.

The Reports, having been previously printed and circulated, were taken as read.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports and accounts, expressed the joy they felt at the recovery, after a long and dangerous illness, of their first President, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, to whom they owed so much. Mr. Nettlefold had been obliged to withdraw from much of his public work, but they were glad to understand that he was willing still to serve on the important advisory committee. With another past president, Mr. George Chitty, he also expressed deep sympathy in his recent sad bereavement, and referred to the loss they had sustained through the death of their first missionary agent, the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, and the Rev. Henry Solly. He welcomed the advent of the Revs. Sydney Street, C. A. Ginever, J. Harvey Smith, and E. R. Hodges, and noted the retirement of eight ministers, leaving seven vacant pulpits, the eighth at Rhyl-street being filled by Dr. Read. He congratulated the Highgate congregation on the opening of their Spears Memorial Hall, the Wandsworth congregation on their recent celebration, and Kilburn on the substantial progress made. For Bermondsey and Walthamstow he bespoke their active sympathy. He then noted two new features in their work, the open-air services held by the Rev. H. S. Perris in Regent's Park, and the Rev. W. H. Rose in Epping Forest, and the successful inauguration of the Auxiliary Fund in connection with the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, for which they were so greatly indebted to their Treasurer, Mr. John Harrison. They had already enabled ten ministers to take advantage of the Fund, which meant a liability of £60 a year. For the present the necessary income was assured, but they were anxious to provide a capital sum of £2,000 to provide for future needs. Asking how the Assembly stood after fifteen years of life, since its inauguration, he recalled the statement of Dr. Martineau, who took the chair at the inaugural meeting, and said that their chief motive was to sustain the smaller congregations in the province and to secure the provision of an adequate ministry. In those efforts he thought they had largely succeeded, and their new Auxiliary Fund provided for another need, which Dr. Drummond had noted, when he asked whether they might not establish a "Widows' Fund" like that in the north. Referring to efforts to reach the unchurched masses, he said that they must never lower their standard in seeking to be popular, and particularly in regard to young people they should make great demands upon their loyalty and devotion. He urged the importance of earnest thought and effort on the part of all members of a congregation, to secure the true devotional spirit in their Church, asking them to bear in mind the appeal of Dr. Hunter's address at the Liverpool Conference on "A Worshipful Church." In conclusion, he commended to them the Guild movement, which he thought had a great part to play in the life of their Churches.

The report and accounts having been adopted, the Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, the Assembly's Minister at Large, gave an address, looking back on his ten years of work in the province. He paid a tribute to the quiet, steady work of the smaller churches, and said that its value could not be estimated by any statistics. They had many difficulties to face, but they were conscious of having a real work to do, as witnesses to spiritual religion and servants of truth.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by the TREASURER, the constitution of the Auxiliary Fund, a draft of which was printed in the report, was unanimously adopted. What the fund offers in the case of ministers in the province with salaries of not more than £200 a year, is to pay half the cost of their insurance in the Ministers' Pension Fund.

The Report of the Advisory Committee was presented by the Rev. F. ALLEN, in the absence of the Rev. J. Harwood, the secretary.

The Rev. F. H. JONES then presented the report of the Committee of Public Questions, and moved its adoption, emphasising the chief points under the several sections of the report. It was, he said, by no means a one-man's report, but the result of serious consideration and genuine conference on the part of the whole committee. It did not aim at laying down the law on any subject; its object was simply to take cognisance of public and national questions, to keep the Assembly in mind of them, and to urge their consideration from the moral and religious point of view.

The report is published in full in our present issue.

Mr. W. H. SHRUBSOLE seconded the motion, and expressed the earnest hope that a strong message might go from that Assembly to the Government, calling upon them to restrain the iniquity of the present treatment of Macedonia by the Turks.

The PRESIDENT later in the meeting explained that no notice of such a motion having been given, even at the beginning of the meeting, he was precluded by the rules from allowing one to be made.

The Rev. S. S. BRETTELL expressed regret that the subject of vivisection had not been dealt with in the report.

Strong objection was taken by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Mr. R. W. Kittle, Mr. T. Elliot, Mr. G. G. Armstrong, and others to the passage in the report referring to the attitude of orthodox Nonconformists to the Passive Resistance movement, the Rev. S. G. Preston, Dr. Lawson Dodd, and others defending it. A motion for the excision of certain sentences was lost, the voting being 16 for and 23 against, only ministers and delegates voting, and the report was then adopted by a majority of the members who voted.

The officers were then re-elected and the various committees appointed, the advisory committee being Rev. F. K. Freeston (president), Messrs. F. Nettlefold. and W. Blake Odgers, K.C., the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and the Rev. J. Harwood (sec.).

On the motion of the PRESIDENT the Rev. S. G. Preston was elected Preacher for 1904, and the usual vote by ballot being taken the Rev. Henry Gow was elected supporter.

The PRESIDENT then offered a welcome to the following representatives of kindred societies:—General Baptist Assembly, Rev. A. J. Marchant; B. and F. U. A., Miss Tagart; S.S.A., Miss Marian Pritchard (president), who each in turn responded, and the meeting was brought to a close.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

After the business meeting the company adjourned to Channing House School for tea, a meeting of the Postal Mission being subsequently held in the smaller schoolroom of the church. Mrs. Farrington was in the chair, and the report was presented by Lady Wilson. Miss Tagart moved and the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed seconded the adoption of the report.

At 6.30 a public meeting was held in the large schoolroom, Mr. F. Withall in the chair. After the singing of the hymn "O Life, that makest all things new," the chairman gave an opening address, dwelling upon the help laymen might give to their churches, and then called upon Mr. T. Elliot, of whom he spoke as chief among their lay preachers, to read a paper on "Lay Preaching, its use in Church work."

Mr. T. ELLIOT spoke as the son of a lay preacher, and one who had himself been for thirty years engaged in the work. The minister, he said, might be an expert in theology, philosophy, or ethics, but religion went deeper, and was the inspirer of the true life in man; in this the lay preacher also had a part, the spiritual influence of man on man being exercised by all. In some ways the lay preacher, being in the midst of the conflicts of everyday life, with its temptations and failures, might be a better preacher and helper of the real needs of men than the regular minister. Lay preachers had a very useful part to play in the life of their churches. Without their help many of the smaller country churches could not be maintained, and in the larger city churches their help was welcomed by ministers, especially in the months of August and September. If they wished to reach the people they must make more use of lay preachers. The Wesleyans and Salvation Army, who had been most successful in their popular appeal, made the most use of lay help. Lay preachers were a second ministry of the kingdom of heaven, an auxiliary in the church, the use of which they ought not to neglect.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS said they were greatly indebted to Mr. Elliot for the splendid service he rendered in the province in supplying the smaller churches, and then reminded them that Jesus was the first great lay preacher. He was convinced that there was a great work to be done if the smaller churches would group themselves under the superintendence of a minister and make fuller use of lay preaching.

Mr. HUGH STANNUS also bore testimony to the stimulus he had received from the late Robert Spears, and the happiness he had found in lay preaching and its opportunities of helpfulness.

The Rev. EDGAR DAPLYN then gave an earnest address on "Our Missionary Work," quoting a recent saying of Dr. Monro Gibson's, "The church that is not aggressive ought not to exist."

Mr. O. A. SHRUBSOLE spoke of "forward movements," pointing out that it was not only a question of numbers, but that there was a forward movement of thought. To go forward in that sense was the vital principle of Unitarians. But however valuable intellectual going forward might be, spiritual going forward was more important still. The thoughts of men changed, but the nature of goodness, love, and self-sacrifice remained the same. Those were the things into which they ought to grow.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED took up the same thought, that it was the spiritual advance to which they must look, the intellectual advance being always subservient to that. They had spiritual communion with men of the most varied creeds, and saw how by different means they had reached the very presence of God. That showed them what were the essential things.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS and J. A. BRINKWORTH also gave brief addresses, and on the motion of the Rev. F. ALLEN, seconded by Sir R. K. WILSON, cordial thanks were given to the Highgate congregation for their hospitality, to which Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR responded.

THE trend of orthodox thought is seen in Professor Garvie's review of F. R. Tennant's "The Sources of the Doctrine of the Fall and Original Sin." "I have often," writes Professor Garvie, "ventured to plead that evangelicalism should give up using the story of the Fall as a foundation for its theological structure." And again: "It is to be hoped that this book will serve its purpose in shattering some of the fetters of the traditional orthodoxy, which prevent the Christian Church, in the freedom of the Spirit, apprehending and exhibiting the Christian gospel in its essential simplicity, its convincing truth, and converting power."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

IT is difficult to realise that it is twelve months ago since I wrote my last winter's letter. Summer has come and gone, and we have been revelling in our holidays in the country or by the sea, weighing up the gains and losses of the past, maturing new plans for the future, and seeking health and strength with which to pursue undaunted and with increased vigour the work that our hand findeth to do. Unfortunately, here in Lancashire we are confronted at the commencement of winter by bad trade. In that respect our conditions are depressing. We hope, however, that ere long the depression will lift, and the prospect brighten. The Manchester District does not feel it so much as some other parts of Lancashire and Cheshire, where relief has already to be distributed, and where there will probably be a considerable decrease in Church revenue.

In Manchester we are not allowing this in any way to interfere with our arrangements for the winter's work; indeed, we seem to have more various activities in prospect than usual. Here, as everywhere else, one piece of work leads to another. It is the reward of honest endeavour for the good of others that there is no abiding place; and I suppose that is why so many, by their aloofness, seem to indicate their belief that the value of the reward is questionable. Fortunately, in this district, it is not often that anyone who can show value in his effort has to complain of the want of encouragement and support. After every great effort we are wont to express a hope that it will be the last for a long time; but before we can settle ourselves to rest, someone comes along with a most urgent and convincing appeal, and almost before we are aware of it, we are pledged to another effort as serious as the last.

To give examples:—When we were working for the Grand Bazaar, by means of which we realised, together with subscriptions, £10,000, we flattered ourselves that we should be able to take it easy for a number of years afterwards. What has happened? Since then two churches alone have succeeded in raising about £13,000 for buildings. One of the things the Association did with the Bazaar money was to erect premises at Bradford for the purposes of church services and Sunday-schools, at a cost of about £3,000. The result is, the scholars have so increased that there is not sufficient room for them, and there is no alternative but to enlarge the premises. An architect has been consulted, and it is found that another £1,000 will have to be spent on additional accommodation if the needs of the situation are to be fully met. And so the Association, which is wholly responsible for the work at Bradford, has to put its neck into the collar once again and get the money. I am glad to report that the progress at Bradford is most encouraging, and the Rev. W. E. Atack is doing good work there.

Although the effort at Bradford is not called a Domestic Mission, it is very similar in character to that which goes by the name, and it is extremely interesting to note that these Missions are now doing greater work than ever. In fact, the usual penalty of pronounced success will have to be paid both at Willert-street and Renshaw-street. There are more scholars than can be properly accommodated, and many more want to come in. The Domestic Mission Committee can no longer delay the work of extending the premises at both centres. Plans have been prepared, and with a view to true economy, it seems necessary to expend at the earliest possible date, in bricks and mortar, about £1,000 at Willert-street, and about £1,500 at Renshaw-street. Taking into consideration the increased cost of upkeep, it is thought that an effort should be made to raise the sum of £4,000. Towards this there is already nearly £1,100 in hand, and a public appeal will soon be made for the rest. In connection with these two Missions, an interesting meeting was held the other evening at the Memorial Hall, at which a paper was read by the Rev. E. P. Barrow on the ideals of Mission work, and discussed by the members of committee. I understand that the paper is to be printed in THE INQUIRER, so that I shall not here refer to it in detail. The activities of the Missions are more numerous and varied than the uninitiated dream of, and the influence exerted over the life of their respective neighbourhoods must be very considerable and beneficial.

The Pendleton friends have had and still have a hard uphill struggle. I have previously written of the changed conditions of the district in which the church stands; and yet one would think there ought to be a grand field for work such as ours amidst so teeming a population if only it gets organised on the right lines. There are some folk at Pendleton who have determined that this shall be done, and it is surprising how the signs of renewed life are returning. They are determined to have a good, capable man for their minister, and by means of subscriptions amongst themselves, and a bazaar (which is to be held next week), they are aiming to raise £500, sufficient to wipe out their small chapel debt, and to provide a nest egg upon which they can draw for any deficiency during the next few years. The bazaar is to be opened on the first day by Sir John Brunner, Bart., M.P., who is always so willing to help on the work of our churches.

There is a feeling of sadness about the fact that after the last Sunday in this month Strangeways Unitarian Free Church is to be finally closed. I think it was in my last letter that I explained how the character of the neighbourhood in which the church was situated had so completely changed that it was impossible to carry on the work successfully, Strangeways having become almost wholly a Jewish quarter. There are, however so many Unitarians scattered over the district, including Lower Broughton, Higher Broughton, and Cheetham Hill, that the District Association feels it incumbent upon it to do its best to draw them together in common service each Sunday, until it is seen whether there really is any possibility of establishing a new church in that part of Manchester. Consequently a series of Sunday services morning and evening, and a Sunday afternoon school are being organised for November and December, and the first services are to be conducted by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal. The Strangeways Unitarians have exercised a great influence over the life of this community for years past. In the days of Dr. Beard, and afterwards when Dr. Brooke Herford was minister, the Strangeways congregation included many men who were engaged honourably in public work of various kinds. Its history is a very interesting and inspiring one; and one cannot but regret that the church should come to such an end.

Next Saturday a far more satisfactory ceremony will take place at Gorton, when a memorial tablet will be unveiled in Brookfield Church to commemorate the opening of Gorton Chapel 200 years ago. There is no decline to record there, but a healthy life and growing numbers under the ministrations of the Rev. George Evans.

The Monthly Meetings of the District Association, which are held in rotation at the various churches, are still proving a great success. Since the summer the Governing Body has visited both Middleton and Moss Side, and at each place there was a large, representative, and enthusiastic gathering. This scheme is doing much good in drawing the churches together and making them feel integral parts of one solid movement. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal preached at Moss Side last Saturday, and although now advancing in years his vigour was remarkable, and his voice clear as ever. My own folk at Moss Side cannot stop adding to their possessions, for they have just placed an order for an organ with Messrs. Jardine & Co., at a cost of between £600 and £700. Most of the money is already raised for the payment of this sum. A new church, such as ours, is not furnished completely all at once. We have to proceed step by step, steadily keeping the end in view.

There is nothing special to report concerning the other churches in this district. They are working hopefully. All save Pendleton have ministers who are energetically and earnestly keeping their hand to the plough, and it is hoped that a minister will soon settle there also. Our young men are full of promise, and our elders are brotherly and wishful to benefit the cause not only by their labours, but also by imparting their experience to their brothers-in-arms. It is a real joy to have the privilege of working with such men, for they are always anxious to show their goodwill, and to help and encourage each other in every possible way.

And finally, I must briefly refer to the good things that are in store for us here in Manchester next November. For the first three Sunday evenings that month the Palace of Varieties has been engaged, and religious services are to be conducted in it by the Revs. J. C. Street and J. P. Hopps. It is a very large theatre, but it is expected that a great amount of public interest will be aroused. A special committee is organising the arrangements, and we feel sure that these popular services will be a means of delivering our message to a considerable number of people who will not come into our churches to hear it. Then, too, the Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are to be held in Manchester this year. A full public announcement will soon be made of the arrangements for the service in Cross-street Chapel, the mass meeting in the Free Trade Hall, the Conferences, and the Conversazione in the Midland Hall (in the new Midland Hotel). We remember many inspiring and successful meetings of this character in the past, and we are determined, as far as in us lies, to maintain the standard which our predecessors have set us. We are sure that the visit of the British and Foreign will do us a great deal of good, and we trust also that it may directly or indirectly receive some good in return. We recognise what a great deal we owe to it, and we hope that a wider and fuller knowledge of its work may be one of the outcomes of its visit to Manchester.

CHARLES ROPER.

LECTURES AT CAMBRIDGE.

SIR,—May I be allowed to direct attention to a course of four Sunday evening lectures by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter at Cambridge, to be delivered in the smaller Assembly Room at the Guildhall on November 8, 15, 22, and 29, at 8.30 p.m. Mr. Carpenter will lecture on "The Gospels: How to Read Them."

I shall be glad to receive the names and addresses of residents and university students to whom I might send cards announcing the lectures. It is several years since anything was attempted in the way of services or lectures at Cambridge, and the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in organising the present course would bespeak the interest and support of such of your readers as have friends in the city.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

We have news of services at the following places, in addition to those noted below:—

Belfast: York-street.—Preacher, the Rev. A. O. Ashworth.

Bridgwater.—In connection with the Sunday School Anniversary. Preacher, the Rev. J. B. Robinson, of Bristol.

Colyton.—Preacher, the Rev. A. Amey. At the monthly afternoon service for children, addresses by the minister and Mr. R. W. Kittle.

Oxford: Percy-street.—Preacher, the Rev. Vernon Herford.

Bolton: Bank Street.—(Presentation.)—A meeting was held after morning service last Sunday in the school-room, for the purpose of making a presentation to the Rev. C. J. Street, on the eve of his departure for Sheffield. The presentation, which consisted of a massive silver flower bowl and a cheque for a substantial sum, was made by Mr. John Lawton on behalf of the congregation of Bank-street, and the Halliwell-road Free Church. The bowl bore an inscription of affectionate greetings and good wishes from the two congregations, and Mr. Lawton said that the remarkable list of contributors showed how high was the regard in which Mr. Street was held. Their two churches had never been in a more flourishing condition, and he assured Mr. Street of the love and gratitude that would be ever felt for his great work in Bolton during the last seven years. They would follow his work in Sheffield with the deepest interest. Mr. Street, in responding, spoke of the pain it gave him to part with so many dear friends. He had need of great courage in saying good-bye. His work at Bolton had been to him a source of much happiness, and he trusted, now that he was going that they would remain a united congregation, full of faith and hope in the future, and determined to maintain the splendid record of past work associated with Bank-street Chapel. He prayed that every blessing might attend their labours, and that they might soon make a happy and prosperous settlement under a new minister. To-morrow (Sunday) Mr. Street is to preach his farewell sermons in Bolton.

Carlisle.—The 20th anniversary of this church was celebrated on Sunday last. The Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., D.D., of Oxford, preached morning and evening. Despite the very unsatisfactory weather, the congregations were excellent, the church being almost full in the evening. Dr. Odgers' services were highly appreciated. The annual tea was held the following Monday evening, about 130 sat down. After tea a well-attended public meeting was held. The following resolution was moved by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle, and seconded by Mr. E. Lowthian and supported by Mr. I. Ridley, both of Carlisle: "That this meeting congratulates the Rev. Charles Travers upon the completion of the tenth year of his ministry to this, his first congregation, and records its satisfaction with the success that has attended his untiring efforts. It expresses its appreciation of the devotedness of his and Mrs. Travers's services' and extends to them every good wish for their future welfare and happiness." A letter of apology for non-attendance, through Mrs. Arlosh's illness, was read from Mr. Arlosh, and telegrams of apology from Rev. J. Forrest, Glasgow, and Alderman Baxter Ellis, Newcastle.

Colne.—On Sunday last the annual school sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Ewart Jenkins, the newly-appointed minister of Padiham, who preached afternoon and evening. In the morning a scholars' service was held, when an address was given by Mr. Albert Wilmore, headmaster of the higher grade school, who is a leading Wesleyan layman.

Cradley.—A sale of work on behalf of Park-lane Chapel, Netherend, took place in the Netherend Mixed School on Monday last, and was opened by Mr. Frank Evers, J.P., of Stourbridge, who referred in his opening speech to his connection with the chapel for upwards of seventy years. Nearly £50 was realised, including subscriptions from friends unable to be present. The harvest festival services were held on Oct. 4, the Rev. A. H. Shelley being the preacher.

Liverpool: Hope Street.—We have already briefly noted the welcome given to the Rev. H. D. Roberts and Mrs. Roberts on his joining the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the ministry of Hope-street Church. The occasion was the annual soirée of the congregation in the Church Hall on Wednesday, September 30. Mr. William Bowring presided, and in his opening speech glanced through the history of the church during the past year, recalling Mr. Armstrong's illness and proffered resignation, and the happy solution arrived at in the joint pastorate which they were inaugurating that night. He offered a most hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Roberts. Mr. A. W. Hall, speaking on behalf of the younger members of the church, joined in the welcome. Mr. Armstrong then offered his own welcome to his colleague and Mrs. Roberts. It was precisely nineteen and half years that night since he became minister of Hope-street Church. He recalled the forbearance and generosity of the congregation to him in his illness. When he recovered he felt that the church needed a more active ministry than he alone could supply. He had placed himself in their hands, and they had wished him to stay; and now they had come to an arrangement which was delightful to him. From the first he had earnestly hoped that he might have Mr. Roberts as his fellow worker. He did not precisely know how they would divide the work between them, but he hoped to do his full half of the preaching, which was his delight. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, in acknowledging the welcome, said he could only promise to do his best to help Mr. Armstrong, the church, and, he would add, the neighbourhood. Within half a mile radius even, there must be residents to whom their gospel would be helpful. They had a free pulpit, whence the minister could deliver his best truth; surely it only required a warm congregational inspiring service, to keep those who perhaps only came to hear what the preacher had to say unto them. Diffidently, he would suggest to the congregation, whether they made full use of their beautiful Gothic church? In matters of form, not simply individual sentiment should count, but rather considerations of the general good. Such a church as theirs, which stood for all that was uplifting, should be a full church. More depended on the individual worshippers than they sometimes realised. He thanked them heartily for the privilege allowed him of helping in a noble cause.

London: Child's Hill.—The iron church which has been erected by the Misses Field, of Hampstead, for the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, at the corner of Weech-road, Finchley-road, and which is to be known as All Souls' Free Church, was opened on Saturday, October 10, by a special service of dedication, conducted by the Revs. Henry Gow and E. Daplyn. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and among those present were the Revs. S. Farrington, J. H. Wicksteed, H. W. Perris, T. E. M. Edwards, S. H. Street, J. Ellis, Eustace Thompson, W. C. Pope, and F. H. Jones. The church, which, including the site, has cost some £1,600, was crowded. The hymn-book adopted is the Irish "Hymns for Christian Worship." On Sunday Mr. Daplyn preached morning and evening, the attendances being reckoned as forty and fifty respectively. For Communion service in the morning, at which individual cups were used, twenty-seven stayed.

London: Deptford.—A series of special services was commenced on October 4, when Rev. A. J. Marchant celebrated his twelfth anniversary and preached on "An Apostle's concept of a Christian minister's office." A tea and social gathering, which was largely attended, followed on the Monday evening, when Mr. John Harrison presided in his ever-genial manner, and addresses were given by Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., George Critchley, B.A., Chas. Ginever, B.A., George Carter, and A. J. Marchant. An encouraging report of the last year's church work was given by Mr. George Ward. On Sunday last Mr. Ward conducted morning service; the evening preacher being Rev. J. H. Wicksteed. On Monday evening the Free Concerts for the People, which were most successful last year, were resumed, with gratifying result. Rev. A. J. Marchant presided. These concerts have undoubtedly popularised the church, helped the membership, and, better than all, provided an uplifting element in "a neighbourhood of mean streets."

London: Little Portland Street.—On Sunday evening the Rev. H. S Perry commenced a series of discourses on "A Working Scheme of Religious Belief," the subject dealt with being "The Nature and Providence of God." The other subjects are:—Oct. 18, "The Origin and Destiny of Man"; Oct. 25, "A Reasonable Doctrine of Revelation and Inspiration"; Nov. 1, "Religion, Politics, and Salvation"; Nov. 8, "The Nature and Use of a True Christian Church"; Nov. 15, "The Imperative Need of a Liberal Religious Faith." The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke resumes his morning ministry at Little Portland-street on Sunday, Nov. 8.

London: Rhyl Street.—(Presentation.)—On the occasion of the retirement through ill-health of the Rev. W. Wilson, from the Rhyl-street Domestic Mission, a presentation of a cheque for £197 has been made to him by a number of friends associated with the Domestic Mission Society, and a beautiful clock has been presented to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson by the congregation, teachers, and scholars at Rhyl-street, "as a slight recognition of the good work done during the three years they were at the Mission." We are very glad to hear that the rest Mr. Wilson has been enjoying in Scotland has been beneficial to his health, and that through the kindness of a shipowner connected with the society, he is shortly to start on a voyage to Natal. It is confidently hoped that with restored strength Mr. Wilson will be able in time to resume ministerial work.

London (Stepney).—At the band of hope meeting on Tuesday evening, Mr. George Ward (N.U.T.A. speaker) gave an address on "Doctors, Water, Action, Rest, and Diet" to an appreciative audience. Juvenile temperance literature was distributed.

Lye.—At the first meeting for the session of the Guild of the Christian Life, on October 11, an address was given by the Rev. G. St. Clair on "John Ruskin, prophet and missioner." At the harvest services on Sunday, the Rev. I. Wrigley preached.

Manchester: Strangeways.—Many friends will learn with regret that the closing services of this church, at one time among the largest and most vigorous of Unitarian churches in the district, are to be held on the last Sunday in October. The burden of maintaining the church has for some time been allowed to fall upon the shoulders of one or two, with the usual inevitable result, that a once important congregation will shortly have disappeared. Existing Unitarian organisations have been unable to prevent a disaster, which both the Wesleyan and Presbyterian bodies in the same district have foreseen, and successfully met, in cases of their own.

Mossley.—The Rev. T. R. Elliott last Sunday celebrated the completion of twenty years of ministry at the Christian Church, and in the evening, having briefly alluded to the fact, preached his recent Provincial Assembly sermon, which was largely of an autobiographical character.

Rushall (Wilts.).—The 197th anniversary of the General Baptist Chapel was commemorated on Sunday, October 4, by special services. In the afternoon and evening the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, was the preacher. The afternoon subject was "Speaking to the Almighty" (Job. xiii. 3), and the evening was "The Divine Institution of Husbandry" (Gen. ii. 15). The chapel was filled by a large and most attentive congregation. The singing was led by a band of musicians, wind and string. On Monday afternoon the annual trustees, meeting was held, followed by a public tea and meeting, presided over by Mr. William Walker, J.P. The Revs. J. Wain, of Trowbridge, and J. A. Brinkworth were among the speakers. On Sunday morning the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth preached for the Primitive Methodists in their new chapel at Upavon.

Shrewsbury.—On Wednesday week a two-days' bazaar in connection with the High-street Church was opened by Mrs. Allman, of Birmingham, to raise funds to meet the liabilities incurred in the thorough renovation and enlargement of the church. Mr. Richard Mansell in the course of the proceedings stated that the total outlay had been about £1,100, and they had still £400 to raise. The work was a great gain to them as a church, and it would be a memorial of the zeal of their minister, the Rev. J. C. Street, and of the good work he and the congregation together had accomplished. Mr. Street, in introducing Mrs. Allman, said they were assembled in connection with the oldest of Nonconformist churches in the town of Shrewsbury. It dated back to the year 1662—the time of the passing of the Act of Uniformity. From that day until the present it had stood distinctly for three things especially. First, for perfect spiritual freedom; secondly, for the profoundest reverence in worship; and thirdly, for the promotion of good and pure living. During all these, years it had sought, as far as it could, to accomplish the three things he had enumerated. The church had a worthy history. It had had during the various generations that had passed a succession of accomplished ministers who had had charge of its affairs, and it ever had an ernest body of faithful men and women who had kept high the banner on which the three principles were inscribed he had just set before them. In their present effort to improve their church, as was often the case, they had miscalculated the cost, but the congregation had thrown themselves zealously into the work, and that bazaar was part of the result. Mrs. Allman opened the bazaar with expressions of sympathy and good wishes, thanks being accorded to her on the motion of the Rev. H. B. Higham, seconded by the Rev. L. Franks (Congregational minister). On the second day the opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. Myers. The amount realised was about £140.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held at the Unitarian Chapel, Merthyr Tydfil, on Monday, October 12, Mr. George Carslake Thompson in the chair. Delegates were present from most of the affiliated churches, including Revs. W. J. Phillips, D. Rees, W. Tudor Jones, J. Hathren Davies, J. P. Kane, and H. Fisher Short; Mr. L. W. Williams, treasurer; Rev. D. J. Williams, and Mr. John Lewis, hon. secs. At the delegates' meeting, at 2.30, reports were received from the churches, showing that in spite of numerous difficulties, the work is being vigorously maintained. The Rev. D. R. Davies, late of the Home Missionary College, is succeeding the Rev. D. Rees in the Rhondda Valley. Pontypridd has not yet secured the services of a minister, but the congregation keeps together as well as possible under the circumstances. The report of the Rev. D. Rees with regard to the new venture at Bridgend was on the whole encouraging, but Mr. Rees only settled there in July. At 4 o'clock a thoroughly practical paper was read by the Rev. H. Fisher Short, entitled, "How to Strengthen our Churches," and after tea a public meeting was held. Mr. G. Ll. Thomas, who occupied the chair, remarked on the advantages which accrue to a man personally from loyal adherence to the Unitarian faith. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones told of his pilgrimage from orthodoxy to Unitarianism, and the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, as a bred and born Unitarian, dwelt on the steadfastness of the fathers who were eager to walk three or four miles regularly to attend public worship, while so many nowadays can hardly muster up energy enough 'to walk a hundred yards to a place of worship. The Rev. D. Rees spoke on "Unitarians and the Social Question." Mr. George Carslake Thompson spoke of Unitarianism from a layman's point of view, and outlined the faith as he understood it. The meeting was one of the best ever held under the auspices of the society, the speaking throughout maintaining a high level of excellence. The attendance, considering the inclement weather, was good. The chairman proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the speakers for their services that evening, and the Rev. D. J. Williams seconded. The singing of a hymn and the benediction brought a successful series of meetings to a close. On Sunday, October 11, the quarterly ministerial exchanges took place, all the available ministers taking part.

Trowbridge.—The 237th anniversary was celebrated at the Congregational Chapel on Wednesday, October 7, by a tea and meeting. Mr. G. Lansdown presided, and addresses were given by the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, J. Warschaeur, J. A. Brinkworth J. Wain, and Mr. W. Walker. Sympathetic letters of regret at inability to attend were received from the Rev. A. J. Pearse and the Rev. H. Sanders, who attended the tea. Last Sunday evening Mr. Wain preached on "The Macedonian Trouble: Our Duty as a Nation and a Church."

THE Church Congress has met this week at Bristol and the Congregational Union at Bournemouth, but our notes on both of these important events we must reserve until next week.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

CITIZEN SUNDAY was last year recognised in London by 495 places of public worship. To-morrow, Oct. 25, the day is to be again observed, and for special subject in the pulpit the representative Citizen Sunday Committee recommends "The Responsibility of the Voter."

TUESDAY next, Oct. 27, is the 350th anniversary of the burning of Michael Servetus at Champel, Geneva, a victim of Calvin's remorseless determination to stamp out the heresy which denied the tripersonality of the Godhead, and the eternity of the Son. Yet Servetus cherished a passionate devotion to Christ. It was the Christian who died at the hands of the bigot. Towards the erection of the "expiatory monument" which is to be unveiled on Tuesday, near the spot of the martydom, we had the pleasure, as we have already announced, of forwarding gifts amounting to £21, from readers of THE INQUIRER, as a token of sympathy with the "faithful sons of Calvin," who have wished thus to mark their reprobation of his act. Both in France and in Switzerland the movement has received influential and widespread support.

NEVER, surely, in the history of modern politics have the "missionary efforts" of a prominent politician met with such unanimous condemnation from the best men of all parties as the Protectionist campaign inaugurated by Mr. Chamberlain at Glasgow. Lord Spencer, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Ritchie, Lord Goschen, and a host of others have all uttered weighty pronouncements against the extraordinary scheme of consolidating the Empire there set forth; and the Duke of Devonshire and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach are to follow on the same side. Mr. Chamberlain, in fact, is waging his battle virtually single-handed; for beyond the Premier himself there is not a man in the Government he is in open alliance with who can for a moment be named beside the statesmen on the other side; while it may well be doubted whether Mr. Balfour's half-hearted support, with its unblushing opportunism, is of any real value to him.

WITH Mr. Chamberlain's sorry performance at Newcastle this week the controversy may indeed be said to pass virtually out of the realm of argument, and to have gone by default to the opponents of his scheme. There was no serious show at Newcastle of answering the weighty criticisms of the past fortnight, but only a repetition of transparent fallacies, wild assertions, and declamation. The battle now will be not between argument and argument, but between the electoral influence of the interests which expect to benefit by Protection, and that of the cause of the people at large whose interests are bound up with cheap commodities. The sooner those influences are put to the test the better for all concerned. Meanwhile, it is gratifying to see that the Liberal leaders are not contenting themselves with a merely negative attitude on the problem of the greater welfare and security of our race. To Mr. Chamberlain's scheme they are opposing plans of their own for strengthening the Empire at its core and improving the moral, intellectual, and physical condition of the forty million people of our Mother-land. Land, education, and temperance reforms are in the forefront of their constructive programme.

THE influentially signed Manifesto on the question of temperance legislation published on Wednesday constitutes a landmark in the history of the movement. The long and remarkable list of signatures includes the names of Lord Peel, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, the Anglican Bishop of London and sixteen of his colleagues, Mr. Arthur Acland, Sir John Gorst, Mr. Leonard Courtenay, Mr. John Burns and other Labour M.P.'s, Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., Dr. Clifford, Dr. Horton, and many other Nonconformist leaders (including the Revs. Stopford Brooke, P. H. Wicksteed, and R. A. Armstrong), Messrs. Joseph Rowntree and Arthur Shearwell, the Dean of Hereford (president of the National Temperance League), Lady Henry Somerset and Mrs. Humphry Ward. The two main points for which the Manifesto declares that any scheme of temperance legislation must provide are (1) a great reduction in the number of licensed premises, and (2) wide powers of local initiative and control. To clear the way for such a scheme the signatories are of opinion that it would be possible to consent to a scheme under which the Legislature made provision for constituting an independent authority, similar to the Irish Church Commissioners, through whose agency compensation would be provided entirely out of the funds raised from the trade for licence-holders, whose licences were not renewed solely on the ground that they were not required, or that all licences or any particular classes of licences were being abolished in the locality.

IMPORTANT limitations are placed upon the application of the compensation scheme. The money raised must not pass through the National Exchequer — a restriction which rules out the suggestion of the publicans that compensation should be paid out of the Excise duties; i.e., out of national taxation. Full discretion is to be preserved to the licensing authority in respect of applications for new licences, and the renewal or transfer of existing licences, and is to be extended to all classes of licences. A definite date is to be fixed at which all compensation shall cease, and no new licences are to have any claim to compensation; while no limit is to be placed on the amount of reduction which may be made. The powers of local self-government, which are not to wait for the expiration of the compensation period, are to include not only reduction of licences, but the imposition, under proper safeguards, of an absolute veto, and the establishment of a system of public control, "under which, subject to the regulations of statutory law, the whole of the retail traffic in a locality could be conducted without the stimulus of private profit, and without direct and appreciable pecuniary gain to the locality itself." Finally, facilities are demanded for a scheme of constructive reform which should include the public provision and maintenance of adequate counter attractions to the public-house.

IT should be noticed that consent to a modified compensation scheme is made absolutely conditional on the simultaneous concession of the local powers enumerated above, and it is earnestly to be hoped that those who maintain, with much justice, that licensees have neither legal nor moral claim to compensation will in time see the wisdom of conceding this much in the interest of a real settlement of this terrible question. Lord Peel's minority report has been accepted by official Liberalism, as well as by the bulk of temperance reformers, as the basis of a future temperance legislation, and doubtless its acceptance will be extended to this modification of the scheme of the report backed by its principal sponsors, Lord Peel and Mr. Whittaker. Every Liberal leader who has spoken during the present campaign, moreover, has placed temperance reform among three or four most urgent domestic questions upon which the party is pledged to prompt legislation on its return to power. It would seem, therefore, that effective measures to grapple with the curse of excessive drinking facilities are at last very much within the range of practical politics.

"One of the first duties lying upon the Liberal Party," said Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman at Bolton last week, "is to re-create, as well as may be after all that has happened, a really national system of education under full public control." "The Liberal Party," says the manifesto of the National Liberal Federation, "have unequivocally promised that the first use to which they will put any power that may be conferred upon them will be to amend the Acts of 1902 and 1903, so as to place all rate-aided elementary schools, without distinction, under popular control, and to secure that no elementary teacher in a rate-aided school shall be subject to any religious test whatsoever." The Liberal Leader told a deputation at Bolton that he was one of the little knot of men who stood out for no compromise in this matter during the debates in the House of Commons on the Education Act of 1870. He declared himself proud of the fact, as well he may be. The compromise has not been observed by the sectarians, and we on our side must abandon it when the opportunity of a settlement comes. "Schools that will not subject themselves to this popular control," says the Liberal Manifesto, "need not close their doors, but they must do without the compulsory subscriptions of men and women who do not share the religious tenets there implanted. This is a plain issue, and one that will be fought out to the end."

Look on that picture; but also on this: A Methodist newspaper calls attention to the case of a school in Dorset now on the county rates, in which the Anglican Prayer-book and its included Catechism are taught, and in which time is given one day every week for preparation for an annual examination by a diocesan inspector. Here we have Prayer-book and Church Catechism taught at the expense of the rate-payers, and special care taken that the teaching shall be thorough, though those rate-payers who are Nonconformists disapprove of the entire arrangement.

But another newspaper, not of the same denomination, but of the same theological school, calls attention to another matter: the Secularistic influences brought to bear upon the Education Department in Victoria. There is an effort to get the children's reading books so edited that any direct reference to Jesus Christ, and his Gospel and his works, may be omitted. In a recent copy of the Victorian school paper, a well-known and pathetic story of the Duff children is told, but the incident that as darkness drew on the children knelt and said "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild," was cut out. The logical outcome of an attitude of extreme hostility to Prayer-book and Catechism Christianity is the Victorian method of treating every reference to Christ as superstition (supposing that the paragraph we have referred to correctly describes Victorian tendency). Much nearer than Victoria there are influences that make against Christianity of any and every kind; against outworn dogmas of the Church, but equally against the broad principles of Christian charity, humility, and faith, which are not only not worn out, but have never yet been very commonly worn. It is time for sincere Christians to come to working terms with each other.

The autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union of England and Wales were held last week at Bournemouth. The visitors received a hearty welcome, which was emphasised by the fact that the Mayor of the town happens this year to be himself a Congregationalist. The programme was a heavy one, and, as is usual where representatives of these churches meet together, the meetings were carried through with energy and enthusiasm. Fourteen hundred in number, they had the buoyancy of a great host.

The presidential address was delivered by Dr. Horton, and is entitled "Marching Orders." It is a long, eloquent, unhesitating call for increased activity in foreign missions. Dr. Horton supports his appeal with an argument that the Church cannot do efficiently its work at home unless it reach out into all the world. "We are an army," he says, "that ought to be on the march, and but for a flying column, insignificant in numbers and equipment—only 7,000 from the vast British Empire—we are gone into barracks, and we sing barrack-room ballads, and suffer from all the nameless demoralisation that barracks always breed." Dr. Horton works out, by a sum in God's arithmetic, that the twentieth century ought to see the whole world converted to Christianity. To this end the Apostles must be set first in the Church. Here is his description:—

> Why did Christ call his disciples ἀπόστολοι? The whole truth was wrapped up in that word. They were men who were sent with a message. They were not philosophers or schoolmen, nor theologians, nor even orators. They were voices proclaiming a fact."

The description of the evangel is characteristic of the man:—

> The thing is so obviously a message to be delivered, a telegraphic despatch to mankind, that it is impossible not to censure a Christendom which, like an idle telegraph boy, is found playing marbles in the street, with the undelivered despatch reserved for her own private use. And yet the Evangel is so delivered to us that its application to mankind is unmistakable.

One of the most important acts of the Union was the election of Principal Mitchell, of the Nottingham Theological Institute, to the vacant sectariat. This is an event of some moment, for the constitution and nature of the Union is in the smelting pot. The issue is nothing less than the substitution of one united Congregational Church for a group of loosely connected independent churches. This is a great question of policy, as well as one involving laborious details, and it needs a strong man to guide the counsels of the members to a wise decision.

At a theological conference the subject for discussion was the "Seat of Authority in Religion," a title reminiscent of Dr. Martineau. It will be well if it prompted many to read or re-read his book. It would appear from the nature of the discussion that there are still some who need the tonic of Dr. Martineau's trenchant criticism of the "Protestants and the Scriptures." But it is clear that many of the speakers have with more or less thoroughness abandoned the mechanical theories of inspiration.

A whole session of the Assembly was devoted to such public questions as the Macedonian massacres, the Education Acts, the magistrates and licensing. These are subjects that demand consideration. And the fact that they were treated with amplitude in separate session and not in a few crowded minutes is worthy of notice, when similar questions are submitted to our own associations.

At the meetings of the Baptist Union at Derby, last week, a good deal of interest was centred in certain proposals for amending the constitution of the Union. There is a desire amongst some of the Baptists, as amongst the Congregationalists, for a greater concentration of their forces, and for according more power to their central organisation. It was proposed to drop the Spring Assembly, to adopt a more regular method of electing the acting council of the Union, and to give it more control over the business of the Assembly. Dr. Clifford favoured the proposed changes. He said:—

> They must have solidarity. Whilst they held stedfastly—and he did, with the utmost tenacity—to the independence of the unit of the one church, yet, as a body of churches, they must be welded together so completely and democratically that they could carry to its maximum energy the whole forces belonging to those churches for the advance of the Kingdom of God.

But the feeling of the Assembly was adverse to the proposals, and they were withdrawn for reference to the churches and local associations.

The German Emperor last Saturday made another religious pronouncement at a dinner in the New Palace at Potsdam, on occasion of the confirmation of two of his sons. Their pledge he likened to the soldier's oath of loyalty to his flag, and urged them to take to heart what the Court Chaplain, Dr. Dryander, had said, that they must become personalities. That was the most important matter for Christians in their daily life. Christ was the most personal of personalities. He commanded world-wide loyalty, so that men of every race were ready to follow him and die for him, and his words had such power because they were the words of the living God. He remained their one helper and deliverer. The Emperor urged his sons to work without ceasing, following the example which Christ himself had set. The conclusion of his speech was curious: "In the wish that you may successfully accomplish this work and that you may therein never lack the help of God and of the Saviour we now drain our glasses."

AT the recent opening of the Birmingham Crematorium letters were read from the three local bishops. The Bishop of Worcester wrote that he wished his body to be rapidly reduced to ashes when his time came, so that it should do no harm to the living. "I do not," Dr. Gore added, "see any serious Christian argument against such a practice, and from a sanitary point of view it has enormous advantages." The Bishop of Lichfield wrote: "I see nothing in it (cremation) which should reasonably give offence to those holding the Christian faith." The Bishop of Coventry wrote: "I am quite sure that we shall come to see that under the conditions of modern life, cremation is not only preferable from the sanitary point of view, but that it also is the most reverent and decent treatment of the bodies of the dead, and one that is in entire accordance with Christian belief."

WITH HEART AND MIND.

O HAPPY days of Faith's first glow,
That trusts and hardly cares to know:
When Hope is high and Love is sure,
And Will is eager to endure!

O happy days when tendrils twine
Around a Someone all divine,
And joyous songs the spirit sings,
More clear the closer that it clings.

O happy days, when pulses beat
To melodies serene and sweet;
When not a cloud bedims the sky,
And all things whisper "God is nigh!"

But not for ever are the days
Thus cheered and blessed with love and praise;
Not always can emotion feed
The spirit's daily growing need.

The lark that soars in highest air,
And carols, free from cark and care,
Soon wearied drops to mother earth,
And seeks the soil that saw its birth.

And so ere long the aspiring soul
That claims in heaven its shining goal,
With pinions tired, and dazzled gaze,
Must turn to earth's accustomed ways.

Well for it then if sober Thought
And beaten paths by Reason wrought,
Uphold it in that darker hour
When fails emotion's fitful power.

Well for it then, if, when the love
Of heart and soul for God above
Shall tire and faint, the spirit find
It still can love with strength and mind.

H. W. HAWKES.

MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS.

DISCUSSION.

I.

SIR,—You have asked me to join in a symposium on Mr. Barrow's suggestive paper. But for that request I should not venture to do so, as in the remembrance of my sixteen years as a domestic missionary, my failures so far outnumber my successes that I would fain be silent.

Mr. Barrow's paper is a ringing challenge to our existing methods, and in many ways it seems unanswerable. I shall not attempt to cover the whole ground, but shall simply note certain ideas, for and against, which it called forth.

I entirely agree that there is little to differentiate our domestic missions from our smaller ordinary congregations. They are unsectarian in the same sense as all our churches are; that is, they are bound by no doctrinal tests. But we send Unitarian missionaries to them, and however little dogmatic teaching is given, the very omission of the essentials of orthodox belief makes them Unitarian in spirit and influence. It cannot be otherwise. If we put non-Unitarian missionaries in them, they would inevitably gravitate towards the fundamentals of orthodoxy. The chief difference, then, between these chapels and those not called domestic missions, is that they are supported by the wealthier congregations for the benefit of the very poor.

The essayist objects to this. Does he object equally to chapels kept open mainly by endowments, and where the congregations could not, by themselves, maintain a ministry?

Mr. Barrow advocates a total separation between social and religious work. Settlements without definitely religious elements on one hand; wandering missionaries on the other. I can see some grounds for his plan; but, on the other hand, has not the old divorce between religion and everyday life, as in Roman Catholicism, and in the sterner Puritanism, had evil results? Nothing, to my mind, is more needed than the close union between piety and the joie de vivre!

Recreation may, I well know, run to extremes; but there is more risk of this apart from the personal influence of a respected religious leader. By a judicious blending of church and social interests the whole nature is met and provided for; and nowhere is this more needed than in poor neighbourhoods where houses are too small, too crowded, too uninviting generally to provide attractive home life.

I entirely agree as to the disastrous effect of promiscuous charity, so called. My conscience accuses me of having let a soft heart frequently out-argue a hard head. But occasions will arise where help may be better administered by a sympathetic friend than by a business-like official, whether parish or central relief; and where self-respect will be less fatally wounded where the giver's right hand knows not what his left hand does. Even a wandering preacher of repentance, such as Mr. Barrow evidently prefers, would read James ii. 14–16 with some qualms.

Mr. Barrow's plea for residential missionaries is cogent. Were I young again, starting my work and unencumbered by wife and family, I should, even at the risk of speedy break-down, adopt the plan as ideal. I tried it for a few nights only, and lost all the good I had derived from a long holiday by the experiment. But where a man is married and has children, he owes a duty to them, and can hardly be called on to subject them to the awful language and degrading sights which were nightly occurrences in my time. Things may be better now.

Lastly, Unitarian religion has its limitations as other modes of faith have, and, speaking only for myself, I have my doubts whether it lends itself readily to the kind of appeal which is supposed to lead to visible conversions, or sudden spiritual regeneration. I have the utmost respect for those who can effect these ends, though, honestly speaking, I rarely, if ever, came upon instances of them, although Bible women, Scripture readers, and evangelists abounded in my district, all being missionaries after Mr. Barrow's own heart.

The quiet and steady building up of character in the young; the establishment of intimate personal relations with the elders; the loving rebuke of intemperance and other sins, along with the haven of shelter at the mission for those who are trying to break away from evil habits; in other words, the methods of the kingdom that cometh not with observation; these seem more in harmony with our general scheme of religion and life.

If in addition to our present methods, we could find or raise up the type of missionary indicated by the essayist, in heaven's name so be it; there is room for them everywhere, as much amongst the heedless, pleasure-loving rich, as amongst the denizens of the slums.

Meanwhile, do not let go of the good we are now attempting, until it is certain we can do it better some other way.

H. W. HAWKES.

II.

MR. BARROW, after well describing the motive of the missions, goes on to say that "the original purpose to meet a particular need has to a certain extent become less distinctive," and that there is little now to mark off our mission stations from churches of the ordinary type. That, it seems to me, is not a perfectly correct statement, for the work is different, at least in method and motive, from the churches connected with our body, and this difference is very apparent between the ordinary church and the mission church of other bodies; and to judge by the earliest reports of the Manchester Domestic Mission, what are regarded by Mr. Barrow as developments were found to be primary necessities from the very beginning. In the first report (1834), I read of the room being taken in which to hold religious services, and of the institution of the Sunday-school. Evidently it was soon found that, to do effective work, there must be some organisation, and without this religious facility I feel that much of my work would be of very little use. But the work of paramount importance is that done in the homes. It is here you begin to touch the thought of the people, and by persistence and following up, you soon become conscious of another, a more moral atmosphere being created, confidences are exchanged, and pressing needs are discovered, and these are not so much material poverty as poverty of mental and moral stamina. As to the lower strata, the drunkenness, the gambling, the cruelty, the vice unpunished, with these the missionary is constantly at close quarters. We go to them on their own ground, and sometimes that ground is in the police court, or the prison. To reach them is the missionary's primary aim, and in pursuance of this aim, we find it necessary to organise social effort, and by this means "to touch the individual life, the soul within." Of course, it is not essentially spiritual work, but it is a means and an outcome. We know of the danger of losing sight of the end in the means; but, where we have to deal with all sorts and conditions of men, we must be all things to all men, if by any means we may win some.

I now come to the economic question. The case of pauperising quoted is, as far as my experience goes, not a typical one; the rule that the Domestic missionary goes upon is that he must know even the minute details before he gives from his poor's purse. The one thing needful is close acquaintance, and this the curate, the heads of schools, Ragged School Unions, medical missions and even the Primitive Methodist visitor often lack.

I have such a very small amount to dispense that any organisation in my case would be superfluous, and I know that the cases I could quote would satisfy the most sceptical. On the other hand, I have often felt that the Charity Organisation Society, instead of preventing pauperism, by the inquiries, the attendance at the office, and the waiting at the doors with other recipients has brought about the very thing intended to be obviated.

Then as to the resident missionary. I have never heard it said that our missions are lock-up missions; certainly that title does not apply to our missions in London, Birmingham, and Liverpool, and, as to the mission at Collyhurst, there is always someone on the premises, day and night, and a room is set apart for consultation, and the transacting of mission business, and the missionary is either there or visiting in the district all day long. I lived on the premises four years, and a short distance away three years, and I have not found that my work has suffered through absence; but I have found, as a consequence of being out of the noises, air, and smells for a few hours, and in slightly improved surroundings that the visits to my people have seemed more acceptable to them. The missionary, after all, is only human, and amenable to the deadening effects of bad air and depressing conditions.

There are other important points raised which I hope others will take up, for all who are engaged in this work must be glad of this opportunity of discussing our methods and aims, and to assure those who support our Domestic Missions, that their peculiar work is to rescue, to reclaim, to save, and that every connected agency has at its back this motive force.

Collyhurst, Manchester. J. W. BISHOP.

III.

THERE is an impression in some quarters that the special object of our missions is to provide domestic servants for forlorn housewives. This, of course, is erroneous, and the aim set before itself by the Domestic Mission Society in its inception two generations ago has been so far exceeded and modified that there does not now seem to be any clear differentia between the so-called domestic and other mission institutions. The question, then, that is now raised seems to be as to the relative advantages of the "Mission" and the "Settlement," followed by the further question whether there is not a still more important function not fully realised by either of these agencies, but which a mission, rightly understood, should achieve, to wit, the propagation of the good tidings of the Kingdom of God.

Missions are on their trial. Criticism is not directed merely to details of their management, but proceeds to a general arrangement of their utility. The case against them has been stated uncompromisingly, even harshly; but on the whole not without truth by Mr. Charles Booth. And now the Rev. E. P. Barrow offers a criticism not the less searching because it is kindly. Personally, I am grateful to him for the service he has rendered in raising this question in a form that invites discussion and should stimulate thought.

Side by side with this criticism from above there is a less articulate criticism from within and around. It is a frequent habit of those who come to the missions to suspect the motives of their neighbours who are also attracted; and the men often hold aloof, though willing that their families shall attend, because they will not allow the stigma of going for what they can get to be attached to themselves. I should be false to the many friends I found at Bell-street if I suffered it to be supposed that this suspicion is generally justified. But I cannot deny that it has some grounds, and I am sure that it is commonly felt. The suspicion is fostered by the evils of promiscuous visiting. Where there are several independent, if not rival, missions in one district, the ideal system of parochial visitation is impossible. Directly the missionary in his visiting goes beyond the circle of his own friends and acquaintances, he runs the risk of encountering other visitors on the doorstep, his action becomes dangerous, and is usually mischievous. The poor need as little as the rich to be constantly looked after by an outsider. With regard to this branch of the work the value of residence is incalculable. The settler in a district will meet his neighbours in a more natural manner. He will share in the social intercourse of the pavement which is so convenient in a poor neighbourhood. And what is more important, the visiting will be mutual; his neighbours will come to see him. In this reciprocity there is a gracious influence. It is true that to live in a slum is a perilous adventure. But in no other way, I believe, are the finest results to be obtained. Probably he who, nurtured in other surroundings, spends his nights as well as his days in mean streets, will be driven by impaired health to take frequent changes of scene. But the work cannot be left, and this would necessitate at least a doubling of the staff of all our London missions.

The homes of the poor are inadequate, and life is dreary, especially for the middle-aged and the old. The gaieties of the young are often unhealthy. Young or old, they all need recreation; exercise for the limb, amusement for the mind. It is good for missionary and people that they should have some fellowship in play. But it is not good that the energies of the missionary should be taxed to provide the amusements. While the people depend on him to supply these, they are liable to regard them as allurements to more serious engagements. Whichever way he turn there is danger. He may make a close ring and entertain only those who come to a religious service. That is fatal. Or he may throw things open and entertain all, at the risk of being known as the "concert man." This also is undesirable. The dream of the municipal theatre may come true some day. The spread of settlements may relieve the missionary of this part of his present work. Why, I fancy, should not the religious leader be one member of such a settlement, pursuing in independence his proper work, while other members, not having heard his call, may respond to the other need for healthy recreation? But as yet the municipal organisation of pleasure does not exist, the settlements are few, and the single-handed missionary must do what he can.

Mission relief is not good. With all his wisdom the missionary cannot make it of social and constructive value. He can relieve individual distress, he cannot lessen the burden of poverty. But under the conditions that exist to-day I do not know that any other agency can do much better except in one respect. While religion and relief go together, there is a danger of mixed motives on the part of the missionary and a certainty that his motives will be suspected. But neither he nor any other almoner can do what is to be the arduous task of a race of statesmen. More serious than the need for relief is the need of honest men for "a fair day's work at a fair day's wage." Until this is within the reach of all, a haphazard philanthropy will continue either to ignore and depress the most worthy, or to relieve the less worthy. The problem is not solved by taking the task of almsgiving out of the hand of the missionary, unless we set the duty of work-giving in the conscience of the nation. Then when the honest man is not destitute, we may, with some success, help the idle, by restraint, if he be incorrigible, or by encouragement, if it be possible to inspire him with some nobler motive by which he may rise to the dignity of his manhood.

But inspiration and motive are in the sphere of religion. Already it is in the fellowship of worship that the missionary finds his highest work and his great desire. Free him from accidentals, remove, as he cannot, undeserved poverty, and he will be free with ampler power to find for himself and commend to his fellows those religious sanctions without which our lives are not strong.

LITERATURE.

MORLEY'S GLADSTONE.*

[FIRST NOTICE.†]

THE fact that within a week of its publication we heard that the first impression of this great work, amounting to 20,000 copies, was exhausted and that it was reprinting, is only one among many signs of the keenness of the interest it has awakened. It is with the utmost satisfaction and thankfulness that we find every step of closer acquaintance with it adding to the conviction that this memorial of a noble life has been brought to a noble completion. The task was stupendous—to tell the story of this man's life covering the greater part of a century, with more than sixty years of strenuous parliamentary and public activity, multitudinous in its interests and the complexity of its relations, and at the same time to present an adequate portraiture of a nature so wonderfully versatile, so lofty in its ideals, so sifted in the conflicts of a great public career, and so variously judged—but the task has been accomplished. "Between two and three hundred thousand written papers of one sort or another," says Mr. Morley, "must have passed under my view"; but even that mass of material, added to all the rest of which the historian of the century must take account, did not daunt him, and with consummate judgment and fine feeling the story has been amply told in these three large volumes, and we feel that here is the man, we can be with Gladstone once more and feel the quickening of his great personality.

"That my book should be a biography without trace of bias," Mr. Morley writes in the Introduction, "no reader will expect. There is at least no bias against the truth; but indifferent neutrality in a work produced, as this is, in the spirit of loyal and affectionate remembrance, would be distasteful, discordant, and impossible. I should be heartily sorry if there were no signs of partiality and no evidence of prepossession." It is one of the things that gives the highest worth to this biography that it is the work of a loyal friend, and one who has the true insight of sympathy and admiration. One other passage of the Introduction we will quote, as indicating Mr. Morley's estimate of the greatness of his subject:—

> Statesmen do far less than they suppose, far less than is implied in their resounding fame, to augment the material prosperity of nations, but in this province, Mr. Gladstone's name stands at the topmost height. Yet no ruler that ever lived felt more deeply the truth—for which I know no better words than Channing's—that to improve man's outward condition is not to improve man himself; this must come from each man's endeavour within his own breast; without that there can be little ground for social hope. Well was it said to him, "You have so lived and wrought that you have kept the soul alive in England." Not in England only was this felt. He was sometimes charged with lowering the sentiment, the lofty and fortifying sentiment, of national pride. At least, it is a ground for national pride that he, the son of English training, practised through long years in the habit and tradition of English public life, standing for long years foremost in accepted authority and renown before the eye of England, so conquered imagination and attachment in other lands, that when the end came it was thought no extravagance for one, not an Englishman, to say, "On the day that Mr. Gladstone died, the world has lost its greatest citizen."

Throughout Mr. Morley's narrative, and particularly in its closing pages, one feels how deeply he is impressed by the nobility of the story he had to tell. The final chapter touches on various characteristics, and among the rest on the potency of Gladstone's influence as making for moral progress in the relations of nations and States to one another. And so he concludes:—

> This vein perhaps brings us too near to the regions of dissertation. Let us rather leave off with thoughts and memories of one who was a vivid example of public duty and of private faithfulness; of a long career that, with every circumstance of splendour, amid all the mire and all the poisons of the world, lighted up in practice even for those who have none of his genius and none of his power, his own precept, "Be inspired with the belief that life is a great and noble calling; not a mean and grovelling thing, that we are to shuffle through as we can, but an elevated and lofty destiny."

This last sentence, originally spoken by Mr. Gladstone in 1877 to the boys of Hawarden Grammar School, is printed also as the motto of an earlier chapter of "Characteristics" in the first volume; for with the artist's true instinct, having told the story of the boyhood and early years, the apprenticeship in life's school of his subject, Mr. Morley pauses, and devotes thirty pages to showing us the manner of man he was, before entering upon the further narrative of the long and crowded life.

The Liverpool of Gladstone's boyhood, the Eton and Oxford of his school and college days, when Arthur Hallam was his friend no less than Tennyson's, his entry into the first reformed Parliament of 1832, and the high promise of those days (though it was the promise of "the rising hope of the stern and unbending Tories,")—all these pass before us, with an account of his first book on "Church and State," and then we come to the chapter on "Characteristics," which leaves upon us vivid impressions, which it is good to carry with us throughout the rest of the narrative. Telling of Gladstone's birth, Mr. Morley has already pointed to a clue for the better understanding of his temperament in the fact that, while of pure Scottish blood, there was in him a blending of the fiery and romantic Highlander with the keen and cautious Lowlander; and here he pictures him, with his extraordinary physical vitality and power of endurance, his marvellous energy both of body and mind, and then notes the chief traits of character, which lifted him to so noble a pre-eminence. Strength and steadfastness of will Mr. Morley singles out as most striking in Gladstone's character. "From force of will, with all its roots in habit, example, conviction, purpose, sprang his leading and most effective qualities. He was never very ready to talk about himself, but when asked what he regarded as his master secret he always said, 'Concentration.'" Slackness, vacuity of mind, he abhorred. He was a man of action, and toil was his native element; an idealist, indeed, but "always applying ideals to their purposes in act."

If he sometimes recalls a fiery hero of the Iliad, at other times he is the grave and studious Benedictine; but whether in quietude or movement, always a man with a purpose and never the loiterer or lounger, never apathetic, never a sufferer from that worst malady of the human soul—from cheerlessness and cold.

We are tempted here to make another quotation from the last page of the first volume, which tells of Mr. Gladstone's rectorial address to the students of Edinburgh University in 1860, when he was fifty years of age, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Palmerston's Government, and still member for the University of Oxford. Mr. Morley quotes the following passage from that address:—"Believe me when I tell you that the thrift of time will repay you in after life with an usury of profit beyond your most sanguine dreams, and that the waste of it will make you dwindle alike in intellectual and in moral stature, beneath your darkest reckonings." And again this maxim from his own inner life:—"The thirst for an enduring fame is near akin to the love of true excellence; but the fame of the moment is a dangerous possession and a bastard motive; and he who does his acts in order that the echo of them may come back as a soft music in his ears, plays false to his noble destiny as a Christian man, places himself in continual danger of dallying with wrong, and taints even his virtous actions at their source."

The chapter of "Characteristics," having noted that Gladstone had the supreme gift of courage, describes his marvellous gifts as an orator and debater, and the rich endowments of his voice. He was absorbed, he said himself, "greatly absorbed in working the institutions of his country." "Nobody," Mr. Morley adds, "ever had less to repent of from that worst waste of human life that comes of unkindness, Kingsley noticed, with some wonder, how he never allowed the magnitude and multiplicity of his labours to excuse him from any of the minor charities and courtesies of life."

Other traits of this wonderful character are dealt with in this most interesting chapter, but in concluding this first notice we must only dwell for a moment on one more. Of the whole of Gladstone's life, it is clearly shown, the main-spring was religion; this is true of his political and his literary activity alike. It was Lord Salisbury who said of him when he died, that he was "a great Christian," and of the truth of that saying these pages bear constant witness. One word of testimony from his own lips we will add here. He is writing to his wife from Carlton House-terrace on Sunday evening, Jan. 21, 1844:—"I am going to end this day of peace by a few words to show that what you said did not lightly pass away from my mind. There is a beautiful little sentence in the works of Charles Lamb concerning one who had been afflicted: 'He gave his heart to the Purifier, and his will to the Sovereign Will of the Universe.' But there is a speech in the third canto of the Paradiso of Dante, spoken by a certain Piccarda, which is a rare gem. I will only quote this one line:—

In la sua volontade è nostra pace.
(In His Will is our peace.)

The words are few and simple, and yet they appear to me to have an inexpressible majesty of truth about them, to be almost as if they were spoken from the very mouth of God. It so happened that (unless my memory much deceives me) I first read that speech on a morning early in the year 1836, which was one of trial. I was profoundly impressed and powerfully sustained, almost absorbed by these words. They cannot be too deeply engraven upon the heart."

THE LAW OF LIKENESS.*

This is a book on religion. Its main proposition is that man is made in the likeness of God. Its secondary one is that the universe, as revealed to us by science, shows us the things that are righteous in God's sight. Its practical outcome is a combination of these two, that we realise our God-likeness the most when we do as the universe does.

This brief summary, however, hardly gives that full flavour of adventure and daring, which a perusal of the book itself must needs inspire. He is indeed a bold man who can accept the physical order of the universe as the purest revelation of the righteousness of God. The book, then, is like a tramp in an African forest by night, and by day beneath the shining heavens of God with Isaiah as our prophet of the Most High, Huxley as our guide and path-finder, and Cecil Rhodes carrying all our baggage and the luncheon basket with no sweet morsel omitted. We pass by the cemeteries of old religions in most exuberant spirits, we hurry on past all things pessimistic, and cast many a word of ridicule at those which fell into that dried-up Slough of Despond, the belief in original sin. We are accompanied by saintliness of spirit, scientific sincerity, and strenuous endeavour. We go forth into the free, fresh air of the Universe as God Himself has made it. And as we journey on we feel in the spirit of man the likeness of the spirit of God. Forgetting that our companions are exceptional, we enjoy a good half-hour's abuse of the lazy and stupid churches that see a bad side to human nature. We stand on the lofty heights of humanity. For one blissful moment we imagine the multitudes to be staying in the valley in order to be near to the old church. We are inspired to build the church of the future on the mountain-peak, and to prophesy good tidings of great joy to all people. Like all the prophets before us, we have a divine message, "the Law of Likeness." Let men enjoy their God-likeness and thoroughly enter into the spirit of it. Let us not fight against God any more. Let us accept all His ways gladly as our own, and think His thoughts with great joy after Him. Let us enjoy the struggle for existence, and throw ourselves heartily into the keen competition of life, and endeavour gladly to fit ourselves to survive. This is the path of righteousness, and our whole strong, earnest, and aspiring nature, body, mind, and spirit, agrees thereto. Like Abraham and Moses before us, we go forward to the promised land. God shows us the way, and to reject His way would be to reject Him.

This, I think, fairly outlines the general impression of Mr. Bates' book alike in its practical, its prophetic, and its theoretical aspects. We lay the book down with a marvellously vivid picture of the evolution of the world. Step by step its successive epochs are presented to us; and, as if by inspiration, the thoughts of the Great Designer flash out upon us as the work proceeds. It is clearly impressed upon our minds that science reveals to us "the things of God." All the processes of nature are forced upon our attention as a revelation of what righteousness is in God's sight. They exercise a moral authority over us, they decide for us what is right and what is wrong. The book brings us continually into the very presence of God. We feel throughout the moral rebuke, the spiritual grasp, the authoritative example of a God who throws at our feet every grain of dust with a meaning, and every wretched and unhealthy life as an admonition and a warning. God, whom we worship ofttimes as a far-away and purely spiritual being, is suddenly found to be knocking upon every door of our house, looking in at every window of our soul, and shaking with heavy hand the foundations of our old temples, destroying our delusions about Him, and revealing Himself as He really is by His own manifest acts. Where formerly we grappled with the hard facts of life, we now find ourselves wrestling for a blessing, like Jacob, with God Himself. In this sense Mr. Bates has written a book of very living religion.

Our criticism of it naturally turns upon the conflict felt by some of us, between the ideals of the inner spirit of man, and the practices of the outer world.

Is not the very ability of the human conscience to say Amen to all that we see taking place in nature greatly exaggerated? Before most men could accept the actions of the external world as their final authority, would they not first have to renounce and surrender some of the highest and most spiritual ideals of man? It is curious that a book upon man's spiritual God-likeness should seem to lead to this conclusion. Surely, if the spirit of man has hitherto been revolted by many of the processes of nature, and if those processes best represent the righteousness of God, then the spirit of man has hitherto been most unlike the spirit of God; and some "Law of Unlikeness" would best account for the peculiar character of man's religion.

But the reading of this book raises a further question. Granting, for the moment, that the processes of evolution are already known to us, and that these processes represent the righteousness of God, does it follow that the imitation of them would be the righteousness of man?

Is there not a difference between the righteousness of God and the righteousness of man? It is right for a father to do many things, which it is wrong for his child to even attempt to do. The mending of the fire, the striking of matches, the rebuking of servants, the drowning or otherwise of the household cat, the ordering of the lives of the other children, the re-hanging of the pictures and the management of the business upon which the whole household depends for its livelihood, are matters which may concern the righteousness of the father, and yet be no concern of the righteousness of the child. And are not we, only infinitely weaker and more dependent, in a like relation towards God? What is right for God, is it always right for me? Am I in God's position? Have I His responsibilities, His knowledge, His experience, His motives? Because God destroys His own works, may I destroy His works? Does my likeness to God amount to the right to do, or even to try to do, with His things, whatever I see Him doing, or trying to do? On the contrary, have I not an internal authority, as of the voice of God Himself, forbidding me to imitate the divine activity, e.g., of death dealing? God kills everybody. Is it, therefore, my duty to kill everybody? And am I a sinner if I do not do so?

Similarly, many things may be right for me, which would be wrong for God. It is right for me to neglect many matters, and for a portion of the day to neglect all matters and simply go to sleep; but similar negligence of all things on God's part would hardly accord with the righteousness of God.

God-likeness, then, is not to be confused with God-sameness. A child may be like his father, but he is not the same as his father. This is the fatal flaw in Mr. Bates' book. Our author seems not to have realised that likeness is a matter of degree. It always implies an admixture of unlikeness. Indeed, the latter element is presumably the larger ingredient. When we speak of one person being like another, we refer usually to some small point of similarity mingling with a vast amount of dissimilarity. So, surely, man's God-likeness may go hand in hand with at least 99 per cent. of God-unlikeness. It may start in that proportion, and primitive man may have been so vastly unlike God, that his one per cent. of God-likeness chiefly manifested its presence in futile moral rebuke of all the rest of him. The sense of sin, or of God-unlikeness, may originally have predominated. In this case, the doctrine of original sin would no longer be the absurdity that Mr. Bates seems to consider it. On the contrary, man's sense of sin, or of God-unlikeness, would be seen as the natural and inevitable consequence of "The Law of Likeness" itself.

POWER.

"Two voices are there, one is of the sea,
One of the mountains."

Wordsworth.

How puny a thing is man
Against the silent strength of the great mountains,
Against the power of the eternal ocean!
How slight is he beside those quenchless fountains
That lave the hard sand in resistless motion!
How small in nature's plan!

How few his days of life,
Compared with the innumerable ages
Of waters' ebb and flow! How short the tale
He writes upon the world's o'ercrowded pages!
His vaunted force of arm, how poor and frail
By the white billows' strife!

The fairest human face
Is shamed before the towering alpen height
Pure and serene in everlasting snows,
Gleaming in noontide's clear effulgent light,
Or flushed with tender tints of sunset rose,
In calm and sacred grace.

For nature knows no end.
Those mountain peaks that guard a foreign land,
These craggy hills with slopes all crimson glory,
And feet washed by the sea, unchanging stand.
Man, only, as a brief and finished story
His years on earth will spend.

Yes, nature is for ever,
Is still the same, of old, now, and to-morrow,
And all man's wisdom is but of a day.
His darling joy and his most tragic sorrow
On radiant wings or dark have fled away,
But nature passes never.

How mighty a thing is man!
His is the heart to love the silent mountains,
The mind that triumphs o'er the eternal ocean,
That fears and wonders at its quenchless fountains,
And grasps the law of its resistless motion
And his own petty span.

So small in nature's plan,
Yet in his soul lies more than her own beauty,
Who in her presence feels his littleness,
And reaches greatness as he bows to duty,
Dimly perceives God's hand stretched out to bless,
And knows the good World-Spirit changing never,
Yesterday, now, to-morrow, and for ever.
How mighty a thing is man!

MY mind showed me it was just such as I—the helpless who feel themselves helpless—that God especially invites to come to Him, and offers all the riches of His salvation; not forgiveness only; forgiveness would be worth little if it left us under the powers of our evil passions; but strength—that strength which enables us to conquer sin.—George Eliot.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IV.—THE HIGHER WORSHIP.

Matthew vi. 1–18.

THE Sermon passes now from Righteousness to Worship—from moral duties to religious duties, as they are sometimes called. And here the same rule applies: nothing is good which is not good right through. In worship we present ourselves before God, to offer those things which are acceptable in His sight. If, when we do this, we want to be seen doing it, and to be admired for doing it, then the goodness of the act is gone, for the motive is wrong. We pretend to honour God, whilst we really wish to be honoured by men. This pretending Jesus calls play-acting, and the pretenders he calls play-actors, or "hypocrites." He takes three acts of piety, and shows the wrong way and the right way of doing them.

FALSE PIETY.

1. In Almsgiving. The play-actors, when they give money in God's service, like to attract attention. They may be compared to criers and heralds, who sound a trumpet before them, when they are going to speak.

2. In Prayer. The play-actors love to stand where they can be seen, sometimes in the synagogue—the house of prayer—and sometimes in the open street, at the hours of prayer. They will even choose the most public places, the corners where the cross-ways meet.

3. In Fasting. The play-actors, when they fast, by sad looks, and other signs, cause it to be understood that they are fasting. They leave their faces unwashed, and their heads unanointed, and by their very carelessness about themselves make themselves conspicuous.

TRUE PIETY.

1. Almsgiving. The children of God give what they give in the quietest possible way. If they give money, they do not stop to count it out, piece by piece, from one hand into the other. What the right hand does is its own secret, and even the left hand is not allowed to know.

2. Prayer. The children of God, praying to their heavenly Father, are glad at times to be alone with Him; to choose a room where He only will see, and to shut the door, that He only may hear. There is no need then for using many words, nor for using the same words many times; He knows, before they speak, what it is they want to say.

3. Fasting. The children of God, when they deny themselves anything, deny themselves also the pleasure of being praised for their self-denial. They, therefore, avoid, if they can, everything that would betray them—singularity of look or habit or manner, and all such ways of making things known, without using words.

IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH.

By these three comparisons Jesus explained the meaning of spiritual worship. Worship is spiritual when it is the worship of the heart, and not simply the service of the hands or of the lips; and also when it is true, sincere, free from selfish and unworthy motive. Three times over Jesus warns his hearers not to be theatrical. We can be theatrical anywhere, and as much in one kind of church as in another. It is very easy for us to know whether we are sincere; we have only to ask ourselves two questions: first, Do we do these right things, which are pleasing to God, because they are pleasing to Him? Secondly, Do we do them as readily, and as regularly, in private, as in public? They are very hard questions for us all to answer, but the worship of God is such a solemn thing, that we ought to do our best to answer them, and to answer them rightly.

REWARD.

There is a difficult word, which Jesus several times uses in this chapter. It is the word "reward." He speaks of the reward which men give, and of the reward which God will give. As to men, we can understand that their praise is a reward to those who care to have it. But does God reward? And ought we not to serve Him without any thought of reward? Everything depends on what we mean by His reward. He does not bargain with us, or pay us for what we do. Reward like that we do not deserve, and ought not to desire. But reward in the sense of satisfaction is quite another thing. If you wait patiently for something to happen, and it happens, your patience is rewarded. If you devote yourself, say, to nursing a sick brother or sister, and your patient recovers, then your devotion is rewarded. And love also has its reward in love returned. We are so made that we cannot help longing for the complete satisfaction of our wants. In respect of our higher wants, Jesus says that this longing will be satisfied: A sprouting seed is rewarded when it meets the sunlight—the light of that sun which it has been wanting all along. God's love meets our love, and makes it happy and content. The play-actors have their reward at once, and it is paid in full; if applause is all they want, applause they shall receive; but God does not applaud—He approves—and if His approval, and not the praise of men, is that which His children really long for, then His good pleasure shall some day be their full reward, and they will want no other.

E. P. B.

I AM told so much evil of that man, and I see so little of it in him, that I begin to suspect he possesses some inconvenient merit which extinguishes that of others.—La Bruyère.

As to the stories which H. G. finds unconvincing, the Professor's verdict is, 'decidedly impressive, and constituting a good case for further investigation.'"

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

THE topics which held the chief place in the programme of the Bristol Congress last week were "Variations in aspects of doctrine in a National Church," and "Racial Characteristics as affecting Missionary Work." It is but rarely that the discussion of doctrinal limits in the Church has much practical value. Speakers are never ready to go to the root of the matter by attempting to justify, on ethical or philosophical grounds, the maintenance of any limits at all. At the same time they are usually shy of going too far into detail. Those portions of the enclosure where the fence is resented by many Churchmen as an irksome restraint, while some boldly overleap it, and others creep surreptitiously underneath, are carefully avoided by Congress essayists. If it is perilous to skate over thin ice, it is painful to tread on burning ground. Thus they are debarred both from fundamental principles and particular applications, and must keep to a safe middle region of detached generalities. The most significant word on the subject was uttered by a man who did not take part in the formal discussion. Preaching on the previous Sunday at St. Mary, Redcliffe, the Bishop of WORCESTER said, "There must be no compromise as regards fundamental creeds: even the doctrine of the Virgin Birth cannot be made an exception." The selection of this doctrine as a special example, and the turn of phrase by which it is introduced, imply the truth that this is the weakest point in the fence. This is the part that seems likely to go first, broken down by pressure from within.

The chief speaker in the session itself was Dr. WACE. The Church of England, he said, had avoided the minute dogmatism of the Church of Rome. "She has contented herself with laying down a certain number of doctrines which those who teach in her name ought to believe, and must not deny; but on points not thus determined she leaves men to their conscience and reason, subject to the light of Divine revelation." It is strange that any reflective man, especially a man of distinguished learning and ability, should be able to use such words without perceiving the preposterous nature of the presumption on which they rest. Conscience and reason, working together in the light of Divine revelation, are all very well in their way, but it seems that they are not to be trusted for essentials. For those we require something better, and find it in the formularies of the Church of England—that is to say, in the Act of Uniformity, which is a product of the conscience and reason of CHARLES II.'s Pensioner Parliament. It is notorious that, but for an accident or a fraud, the schedule to that Act would not have been the Elizabethan Prayer Book, but the very different Second Prayer Book of EDWARD VI. No copy of that book, it was reported, could be found, so that the later book, revised by Convocation, was substituted. What advantage had the conscience and reason of the seventeenth century over those of the twentieth? Is the Divine revelation so unimportant a factor that its continuous education of the world for two hundred and forty years may be neglected? Or had SHELDON and his train of tactical prelates some supernatural insight which is withheld to-day from the heirs of all this new knowledge? The assignment to "the Church"—that ill-defined entity—of authority to dictate to any man what he shall believe, always means, in the last analysis, that he shall give up the guidance of the conscience and reason with which he himself is divinely (but superfluously) endowed, and trust instead the conscience and reason of some other person or persons, generally unknown.

The conference on Racial Characteristics as affecting missionary work was begun by Bishop MONTGOMERY, secretary of the S.P.G. In a paper admirable alike for its matter and tone, he sketches the great distinguishing characteristics of three types of mankind—the British race, all over the world, which is to be regarded for present purposes as the teacher; the intellectual pupil, dwelling in Asia; the unintellectual pupil, dwelling in Africa. The portraits, sketched in a few bold strokes, are of the kind which we recognise at once to be true. The moral of the limner is gently but sufficiently urged by simply setting them side by side. It is, that the teacher must above all things be docile and humble. "I believe," said the essayist, "that the gifts and graces of humanity are scattered over the races of the world, all of those gifts to be possessed by all, but given to us in the first place in differing quantities. What is overlaid here is topmost there. But we look for the day when each shall have so learnt from the other, whatever our history or colour, that human life in the future may rise, under GOD, to some higher level because each has imparted and each received. How are we to accomplish this end and who are the best instruments?" This is a noble statement of the missionary ideal.

The paper contributed by Dr. TISDALL, of the C.M.S., who followed, is an illustration of the difference in outlook and method which may characterise two earnest co-workers in the same cause. He regards the avatâras of VISHNU, and other legends of the same kind, as "parodies, or at least gross misconceptions of the truth," which is that "such a manifestation of God has been given us in the Lord Jesus Christ alone." He would proceed to teach "the doctrine of the one true Incarnation," and thereby prove "all other supposed Incarnations to be false." This method commends itself to him so much that he regrets the modern Hindu and Buddhist conviction that it is wrong to take the life of any living thing. It is an obstacle in the way of the Atonement theory. He would point the modern Hindus to passages in Vedic literature which show clearly "that their own highly revered ancestors agreed with the Hebrews in believing that 'without shedding of blood there is no remission.' . . . Thus the Hindu and the Buddhist may be led by their own ancient faith to perceive the need of an Atonement, while rejoicing that there is now no more sacrifice for sin."

The general impression which we receive from a comparison of the reports of successive Church Congresses is that, while movement is very slow, there is a real movement in the Church towards the more liberal aspects of religion. The Neo-Catholic revival seems to be an almost spent wave. Evangelicalism is for that reason more audible, but no stronger than it has been during the last twenty years. The Broad Church, as a separate section, is neither strong nor loud, but the leaven of liberal thinking is slowly—very slowly—assimilating to itself the great mass of ostensibly orthodox opinion.

THE thirty-third general meeting of the Netherlands Protestantenbond is to be held at Zutfen on Tuesday and Wednesday next. At the evening service, in the Groote Kerk, on Tuesday, Dr. A. Rutgers van der Loeff is to be the preacher. Wednesday morning is devoted to business. An evening meal in the Schouwburgzaal is to be followed by a public meeting, at which foreign representatives will have an opportunity of speaking. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to be represented by the Rev. V. D. Davis, Editor of THE INQUIRER.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

PUBLIC LECTURE AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.

THE session opened at Manchester College on Monday, when the public lecture was given by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., in the presence of a large company of the friends and supporters of the college. Mr. Jacks enters with the present session on his duties as professor of philosophy, in succession to Professor Upton, and also takes up again the Tate lectureship on preaching and pastoral work. The opening lecture was a stimulating and eloquent appeal for the strenuous life of the scholar, demanded not only by sound philosophy, but as due preparation for the ministry of religion; it was a happy augury of the invigorating influence Mr. Jacks is so well fitted to bring into the life of the college. The lecture is to be immediately published.

THE STRENUOUS LIFE IN RELATION TO THE STUDY OF PHILOSOPHY.

The studies of the college, Mr. Jacks said, ranged over a wide field; but through them all the personality of the student remained constant, and that was the subject of his opening lecture. It would be his privilege to be associated with them in the study of philosophy, but on that occasion he would speak rather of the philosophy of study. They would see, however, that the two things were intimately related. He then continued:—

Coming to this college as I do hot from the field of active ministerial work my uppermost feelings are naturally those of a man who finds himself in a new world. I trust it will not be more remarkable to others than it will be to myself if in what follows I betray imperfect acquaintance with the conditions of college life. To the older hands who are present I must appeal in any case for that degree of indulgence which a beginner may fairly expect. At the same time I will guard myself from irrelevance as far as possible by starting from ground that is familiar to me. Surely the best thing a person situated as I am can claim to possess are the fruits of his experience—so far as it has gone. Not undervaluing what he has learnt from books, he will value still more what he has learnt from men, from the world, from life. If he had any equipment as a teacher, that will be the most valuable part of it. My remarks to-day, at all events, shall contain, as far as I can make them do so, the lessons of my experience.

Lessons of Experience.

By experience in this connection I do not mean those practical lessons of ministerial work, those considerations of the duties, difficulties, dangers of the ministerial office which fall within my province as Tate Lecturer. The experience of the minister, need I say, goes much deeper than that. No man can spend even so little as sixteen years in preaching the Gospel without arriving at what may be called, without arrogance, a philosophy of life. Originating, it may be, in some profound religious experience, enlarged by study; getting itself tested in the field of endeavour; uttered, perhaps, in the language of prayer oftener than in that of preaching; receiving constant illustration from that many-sided contact with men which is the privilege of his office; suggested anew in the babble of the children who have gathered round him; often finding a heart-piercing witness as he watched the progress of some victorious soul through the water floods of affliction or the valley of shadows; lifting him up in hours of depression, and reminding him that he is an unprofitable servant in the day of his success—the minister's philosophy of life slowly takes shape and becomes articulate in the secret chambers of the mind. Applicable, as he thinks, to all men in some measure, yet to himself as a student and preacher of the mysteries of God its application is always the closest, its light the most welcome, its warnings the most impressive, its rebukes the severest, its call to action the most urgent. Whenever I have enjoyed the confidence of my brother ministers to the extent of sharing the thoughts they have thus won on the deepest of subjects, I must say that as a student of philosophy I have learned priceless lessons. I confess that these homely and unpretentious views of life, formed in the heat and the urgency of the battle, and often expressed in the simplest and most feeling language, have seemed to me at times to approach nearer the ultimate truth of things than many an august system of philosophy excogitated by some retired thinker in the quiet of his lonely citadel. At all events I can say for myself that whatever store I set by what I have learnt from books, I set greater store by what has come to me in the manner described. It constitutes the definite basis of experience on which I shall rest my remarks to-day.

Teacher and Learner.

One more word and we will get to business. The spirit of this college being what it is, I conceive that whosoever comes here to teach comes to learn also. Keen as is my interest in that new phase of teaching upon which I now enter, I should be an unfilial son of my Alma Mater were I to forget that my part here is that of a learner also. Is it presumptuous to hope that here, by converse with riper minds, I shall find a new stimulus and inspiration; that my own thoughts will receive confirmation if they are true and correction if they are faulty; that by the mere exercise of explaining to others what seems true to oneself the mental horizon will be made to expand; that in the mutual clash of our minds I shall receive more than I can give; that new light will break out in dark places; that old truths will connect themselves in higher relationships and so add new provinces to the kingdom of truth. A confession of one's fallibility, a disclaimer of finality in opinion, a willingness to learn, a desire for intellectual growth, a deference to the authority of the noblest characters, a wholesome dread of one's own limitations, a recognition that truth in present possession is but an earnest of truth to come, a spirit of reverence for that which is demonstrably above oneself instead of contempt for that which is conceivably below—these surely are here elementary qualifications in the teacher of any subject, but perhaps most incumbent on him who speaks of philosophy within these walls. For the teacher of philosophy in Manchester College must tread, however haltingly, in the steps of a great tradition. He has before him illustrious examples both of the living and the dead. We have merely to name the names of Martineau and Upton, and at once we stand in the presence of this never-to-be-forgotten truth: that in the greatest and best of men humility is ever the secret of strength.

Brains and Will.

Proceeding with his address, Mr. Jacks quoted Sir Norman Lockyer as a believer in the popular gospel, that what was wanted for the redemption of society was an improved quality of brains. But brains alone, he said, would not suffice, as Shakespeare had shown in Hamlet. There must be will as well as brain power, or life is doomed to impotence. Between intellect, imagination, and will there was indeed no final separation, for the human mind is an undivided whole, and the various faculties are but the various modes by which the ultimate fact of personality is expressed, but it was on the side of defective will-power that the peril of the present time became apparent. Singleness of aim, directness of purpose, consistency of life, unity of endeavour, were made increasingly difficult by the conditions under which they lived. Amid a scene of growing distractions only men of resolute will could preserve their moral integrity. It was so in the world, and it was so amid the multiplicity of studies pressed upon them in that University. Distraction was the salient fact in the psychology of modern men. Life was becoming a fever. Rapidity of physical transit was only an outward and visible sign of the moral restlessness of the age. Men cared little to attain to any knowledge of the true end of life. The very conception of an end was irritating to them. There was never more activity than now, and never less knowledge of what all the activity was for. Only the mentally blind could fail to see that ills manifold and terrible were following on the restlessness of modern life. He had observed again and again how the mere multiplicity of pleasures was disintegrating the home life of the well-to-do classes. He did not like to contemplate the effect on national character of, say, two centuries of such a whirl as that in which they lived in great cities, and, in fact, everywhere. They seemed to be losing the sense of direction altogether and the idea of purpose in life.

Gospel of Purpose.

Such considerations had direct bearing on their work in that College as students for the ministry. The great functions of the Church in the present day he held to be to restore the spirit of purpose to human life. It was not merely to bring enlightenment to the world. Already the world had received more enlightenment, especially concerning theology, than it knew what to do with. Its great need was to be saved not from darkness of the understanding, but from confusion of the will. Their business was to restore purpose to life. They must preach a gospel of purpose, and must themselves be purposeful men. While undoubtedly in the ministry they wanted scholars and gentlemen and saints, yet before all else they wanted resolute men, courageous, strenuous men, with high moral purpose, who would rouse the spirit of purpose in those with whom they had to do. He was not overlooking certain deeper matters involved in the motives of their work. It was no ideal of self-centred violence he held before them. On the contrary, no strength could be theirs except it rested on obedience, no valour of heart but what was rooted in submission. Properly speaking, the only moral will was the consecrated will.

Strenuous Philosophers:

Of their special studies it was equally true to say that there must be no separation between the intellectual and moral life, and he enforced the need for strenuousness. To teach philosophy among flaccid souls was to waste one's breath. The human mind, considered as a mere tabula rasa—in a purely passive state—was incapable of receiving a demonstration of God or of duty. The attitude of mind that found significance in those proofs must be dynamic through and through. The student who dumbly sat in his place waiting for the teacher to offer him solutions that he might jot them down in his note-book and reproduce them in the examination room was a student without promise so far as philosophy was concerned. But when a glimpse had been caught of some glorious meaning hidden in life, and when in the hope of confirming and enlarging that glimpse a man felt it worth his while to bear the toil of inquiry and face the risks of error, then they had the material out of which philosophers were made.

There was in the address further enforcement of the need of strenuousness and consecrated purpose in the student for the ministry, with special reference to the conditions of Oxford life. But for this and for the concluding passages on the true temper and method of philosophy we must refer our readers to the published address as a whole. Only the final words we will quote. Mr. Jacks pleaded for greater simplicity and naturalness in the language of philosophy, and then he added:—

Plain men will realise that between their normal convictions and the deepest truths of philosophy there is no such gulf as they have been wont to imagine. Two verses of William Watson's occur to my mind, applied by him to one whose name in this connection may sound somewhat strange—the poet Burns—but not unworthy, I think, to paint the ideal of the perfect philosopher:—

> No mystic torch through Time he bore,
> No virgin veil from Life he tore;
> * * * *
> He saw what all men see, no more,
> In Heaven and Earth:
> But as, when thunder crashes nigh,
> All darkness opes one flaming eye,
> And earth leaps up to meet the sky—
> So fiery clear
> Did the old truths that men pass by
> To him appear.

POPULAR SERVICES.

SIR,—I have to correct a letter of mine which appeared some weeks since in your columns. Helpers are still urgently needed for the Popular Services to be held in the Grand Theatre, Islington, next month. But Tuesday, 27th inst. (and not, as there stated, Wednesday, 28th), is the day when helpers are requested first to meet at the Unity Schools, Upper-street, Islington. All who can render assistance in the singing may find Mr. Arnold Jones and others at this place at 8 o'clock on that night. Canvassers will not be required till the following Tuesday at the same time and place, and also on the following evenings of that week. This opportunity of giving the highest kind of help to the many in our great town who direly need it is one which should evoke respone from those among us who hold their own religion dear.

THE SYROPHŒNICIAN WOMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent of last week finds moral and religious difficulty in the words, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs," and, to "clear the character" of the speaker, proposes their omission. If they were really inconsistent with that character, would they have been inserted by evangelists who, we may assume, were at least as jealous for the honour of the Master as any critic of to-day can possibly be? Are they not simply an example of the Irony of Jesus? There are other well-known examples. They appear in this instance to have been deliberately intended to excite, and at the same time to test, that moral and spiritual faith, which was the necessary condition of worthy entreaty, worthy to be heard. They may very well have been nothing more than a current proverb, familiar enough to those who "knew not the law," and were looked upon as "cursed." We know also how the seeming severity of an expression may be completely dispelled, in the very moment of utterance, by the look and tone of the speaker, how it may act, and be meant to act, as a spur to further thought and more serious effort.

I would like to ask further, how "omission" can be justified, when there is nothing to throw suspicion on the genuineness of the text. In the absence of such ground of objection, the rules of sound criticism demand equal treatment for "gracious words" and "hard sayings" alike.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION BAZAAR.

SIR,—As we find prevailing, particularly in the Manchester district, misconceptions seriously prejudicial to the success of the above bazaar, will you kindly allow us to state that the congregations of the Union are actively preparing for the effort, and that the bazaar will be held in Manchester in October of next year. At the last meeting of the general committee representatives of all the congregations unanimously confirmed their original resolution, viz., to raise the sum of £5,000; one half for investment to be held in trust, the interest of which shall be used for the general purposes of the Union, the other half to assist the congregation at Ashton-under-Lyne to build its church, to help other congregations to pay off building debts, or to be otherwise expended as the Union shall decide. The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire has promised a stall. It is hoped that similar help may be given from other quarters, and that the bazaar will receive hearty and liberal support from all who are interested in the increasing work of the Union.

LAY PREACHING.

SIR,—Will you allow me a word or two, in support of Mr. Elliot's plea for lay preaching, as a part of church work, which in our community needs organising and strengthening? In his able paper read at the meeting of the Provincial Assembly at Highgate, last week, he pointed out that the Methodists and Salvationists owed their success in a great measure to the lay agents they employed to spread their doctrines. Without wealthy adherents, and with only a limited body of paid officials, they have contrived to place one of their religious centres in nearly every locality. They do not wait till they have built churches or halls and secured ministers, but they proclaim their message by enthusiastic disciples, in the street or in any room they can secure. We, on the contrary, are always trying to establish independent and isolated posts, and if in a little time these lonely citadels are not able to support their paid overseers we are inclined to regard our venture as a failure.

The Census recently instituted by the Daily News shows that in the great centres of population we are deplorably weak, and may be regarded as a negligible quantity. There are thousands of people, however, outside our churches who believe in our tenets, and would, if gathered in, form a conquering host, but we neglect all these fragments, and suffer in consequence. So long as "one church, one paid minister," is the rule, so long we shall be weak in effort and feeble in purpose. We have up and down the country, too, little churches, slightly endowed and presided over by ministers who have gradually lost all power for aggressive effort, through their want of fellowship with enthusiastic spirits. These detached churches are in process of extinction, and if something is not done, it is only a question of time as to their collapse.

What is wanted is that all churches, large and small, in a given area, should combine for aggressive warfare, and mutual defence, and should have a paid superintending minister to organise and direct, under the control of a committee for the whole district, and with the aid of lay helpers. I shall be told, I know, that the sapping of independence and the multiplication of offshoots weaken the parent stem, but I do not believe it. Every effort at development and extension stirs up energy and prevents stagnation. The superintending minister could not, of course, minister exclusively to any one church, and churches should learn to deny themselves in this respect, and should be more anxious for the extension of the Kingdom of God, than for the pleasant experience of listening always to a pleasant voice. It will be said, too, that you cannot get the lay helpers. Well, I believe that there are plenty of intelligent men and women, in our communion, who would be glad to give vent to their soul's voice. I should like also to see the institution of a flying brigade, men of great power as preachers, who should not be attached to any one district, but should have the whole country for their parish, and be under the command of the central organisation.

These proposals may amount to a revolution in our methods of proceeding, but if they will tend towards a newer life, and a more successful one, they are worth trying. Men and women are dissatisfied with the old dogmas, the worn-out fables, and the insincere professions, and we have the newer gospel to offer them, but we lack zeal and energy and faith in our mission. "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion."

ADELAIDE UNITARIANS.

THE Adelaide Register of August 17 devoted a column to an account, by a special reporter, of "The Home of Unitarianism" in that city. In a recent Census of South Australia, over 700 people had professed themselves Unitarians, but many of these are scattered over the country, and have no church of their own fellowship within reach. Except for a branch at Shady Grove, near Mount Barker, they have only the one church, in Adelaide itself. Of this, and the service he attended, the Register representative gives the following account:—

The handsome building in Wakefield-street indicates the support of a substantial community. The premises consist of the church—to which was recently added through the generous beneficence of the present treasurer (Mr. A. M. Simpson) and other subscribers a pretty chancel and a large organ—and the Sunday-school, which is of neat and solid design.

Memories of Early Days.

Since that far-away eleventh day in July, 1854, when the hopes of a small but ardent band matured into a resolution to found a church of the Unitarian order in this state, and to secure a minister from the old country, prosperity has advanced with the equally steady progress of time. Of those who took part in the inaugural movement few now survive. Among them were men whose memories are revered by the younger generation—such old colonists as Dr. Everard, William Kay, Edward Montgomery Martin, William Everard, Major Herford, A. Simpson, and John Howard Clark. The last-named crowded into his comparatively brief span of life, besides his multitude of public duties, devoted service to the struggling church. Miss C. H. Spence was also early identified with its development.

The Rev. J. C. Woods.

On September 19, 1855, the Rev. John Crawford Woods, B.A., arrived from England to take up the ministry. The first and second Sundays following his landing in South Australia were devoted to divine communion in private houses; and on the second Sunday in October, 1855, the inaugural public service was held in a room adjoining Green's Exchange in King William-street. Here a generous welcome was given to Mr. Woods. At that period many prominent colonists joined in promoting the cause; and so auspicious were the omens that the originators of the movement resolved to give permanency to their work. As a result the foundation stone of the present building was laid on December 23, 1856, by the Hon. John Baker, father of the first President of the Commonwealth Senate; and on July 5, 1857, it was formally opened for public worship.

Mr. Woods's settlement proved extremely fortunate. Many loyal friends and supporters were won by him for the church through his endearing qualities of heart and mind. During his labours, covering 33 years, he earned universal respect and confidence. Under his control the denomination became socially influential and powerful in benevolent activities. After twenty years of continual ministry, Mr. Woods revisited his native land, and for two years Mr. C. L. Whitham carried on the pastorate. Until 1887 Mr. Woods, after his return, continued his work, and amid failing health for two years more; then a suitable successor was procured. Four years' tenure of the pastorate by the Rev. R. C. Dendy witnessed material advances, particularly in the Sunday school and the service of song.

The Rev. John Reid.

The Rev. John Reid, M.A., late of Melbourne, now occupies the pulpit; and his attainments as a scholar, with his many other fine qualities, has earned for him popularity and goodwill. So in the forty-seven years which have run their course since it was founded, there have been many changes with losses and gains, but the church has prospered, thanks to the bond of fellowship so marked among its members, as well as to their liberal subscriptions towards its maintenance. Some of South Australia's "Grand Old Men" have their names indelibly inscribed in the annals of Unitarian history, and memorial windows aid the younger generations in keeping alive the memories of their pioneer ancestors. One fine old stained glass design commemorates the life and labours of the father of Mr. A. M. Simpson, the present treasurer, and a most active member. Other memorials are dedicated to the late Dr. Everard and William Kay. Upon the western wall a brass tablet indicates the fate of Captain Hubbe, who was killed in 1900 while serving his country in South Africa.

A Sunday Service.

The second Sunday of this month was a wretched day for weather; and although Unitarians have a reputation for sturdy adherence to principles, only a small congregation gathered at the evening service. There the simplicity of the proceedings was marked. Immediately upon entering the vestibule I felt myself surrounded by an atmosphere of cordiality such as one may often realise in our country towns, but seldom among the members of city churches. There was nothing imposing in the place; and the preacher's address took the form of a review of previous studies, so that to some extent I felt myself debarred from entering into the spirit of the discourse. During the rendering of the anthem and of the voluntary, the quiet interest was undisturbed by the discordant jingle of coin in transit. Mr. Reid's reputation as an orator is hardly upheld in the pulpit, where he relies greatly upon his notes, and expounds an abstruse essay rather than utters impromptu thoughts; but he was deeply in earnest, and won the close attention of the congregation. An elocutionary feast was Mr. Reid's rendering of Psalms ix. and xiv., and his all-embracing prayer might have moved the heart of a misanthrope. Following the anthem he proceeded to proffer "an answer to the all-important question: 'Can we still believe?'"

The Sermon.

The text was chosen from a portion of the first verse of the 14th Psalm: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." "Perhaps it would assist you to grasp the manner in which I desire to apply my lesson," said he, "by pointing out that the words 'there is' are printed in italics, thus denoting their insertion by the translators, in order, as they thought, to make better reading of the quotation." But the original purport of the saying served Mr. Reid's desires exactly. He would interpret the phrase as echoing the feeling of the man who was trying to persuade himself with brusque asperity—"No God! Banish the voice of my conscience!" Many people to-day were trying the same method of assuring themselves of the non-existence of the Creator, but there was bound to arise some circumstance in the tenor of their lives which would tear them from their falsely acquired ease. Man, though God had made him a free agent with a right to determine his own course this side the Bar, could not in this way avoid the terrible truth of his sin; his hell would fall upon him in the shape of retribution, and remorse would find him its victim.

As supporting his claims the pastor had recourse to a method which, as he stated, was not often employed in the pulpit. He asked the liberty to read an article from a recent number of the Spectator, entitled "Science and Creative Purpose." The writer commented upon a speech of Lord Kelvin's, in which he had stated that scientific thought was compelled to accept the idea of creative power. Science, the majority contended, utterly frustrated all arguments about the existence of God; but the testimony of that great light in this high realm was ample reply to the feeble objections of the multitude. The best evidence of all of the existence of the Great Father was, however, the testimony of pure and upright lives, guided by belief in a Divine Creator. That best answered the question—"Can we still believe?"

Impressive reverence characterised the service as a whole. The sound of the organ solo having died away, a fine old martial hymn was sung; then the choir and congregation chanted in unison the Lord's Prayer, and the benediction was pronounced by the pastor in solemn tones.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

TWELVE MONTHS hence the Midlands will be on the eve of accomplishing their heart's desire. They will have raised a substantial sum of money which, in a few days, will be increased to the goodly amount of five thousand pounds. This is prophesying before the event, but the Midlands are determined that the prophecy shall become true. Every one of our churches in the district will be busy during the next twelve months in collecting together gifts in cash or in kind for the object they all have in view. It is a great undertaking but it has already been begun, and will be carried through to a successful ending. The money is wanted by the Midland Christian Union to help the churches in the district which are in need of help, its resources being far from adequate to the calls that are made upon them. Next year also will be the centenary of the death of Joseph Priestley which, in Birmingham of all places, should not be allowed to pass without due commemoration. We have to thank our friend the Rev. Joseph Wood for bringing the subject before the delegates from our churches at the annual meeting of the Union last March in an eloquent speech delivered in his own church, and which was afterwards widely circulated in pamphlet form. The preliminary steps were completed on Monday last at Warwick, before the holding of the autumnal conference of the Union, when an executive committee was appointed with Mr. Herbert New as chairman, Mr. J. P. P. Dutfield (Waverley-road Church) and Mr. E. Ellis Townley (Old Meeting), joint secretaries, and Mr. P. J. Worsley, Junior (Church of the Messiah), treasurer. It was decided to hold a bazaar in the Birmingham Town Hall during the week ending October 29, 1904. With the money then to be realised and donations previously obtained, the sum I have named (£5,000) will be safe in the treasurer's hands. It is easy to write this on paper, but it will be less easy to actually do what we propose. "What we want is not the means," said Mr. Wood in his speech of March last, "but the disposition. What we want is the enthusiasm, the passion of our cause. . . . Those who object to bazaars can give their subscriptions, and those who object to subscriptions can support the bazaar. Nobody need be left out. There must be, if it is to succeed, a united effort. It is useless to attempt this undertaking without some enthusiasm, without faith that we can do it, without the heartiest co-operation of everybody. Every church must join in the movement, the aided churches as well as others. . . . It will do you and your churches a world of good to unite in an effort like this. It will bring you closer to each other, it will strengthen the bonds of fellowship in providing a common object for gifts and labour. It will stimulate zeal; for what you do for others will re-act upon yourselves."

If our friends in this district will take these words to heart and act accordingly, the thing will be done. Our friends in the Manchester district raised twice the amount a few years ago. Yorkshire is making an effort similar to our own, and the East Cheshire Union is to hold a bazaar at the same time as ours for raising a similar sum. Why should not the Midlands do as well as the North?

The movement I have outlined, and which will engage the earnest efforts of our friends throughout the district for some months to come, will form a fitting memorial to Dr. Priestley, who died 100 years ago next February. As Mr. Wood told us, "there comes a call and an opportunity to the religious public of Birmingham and the district, with which he was so closely identified, to signalise their appreciation of his character and work and of the services he rendered to the cause of progressive religious thought." Many changes have taken place since he lived in Birmingham, though there is still much to be done before the fight for religious equality is wholly won. Writing from Birmingham to a friend in 1787, Priestley says: "The bishop of the diocese was here last Sunday, confirming, and to each person confirmed he gave a small tract on confirmation and another against Socinianism, and myself (I am told) in particular." I think some improvement has taken place in this respect since that letter was written. In another letter he writes: "If the Establishment were out of the way Unitarianism would have a rapid spread." In this case we have not advanced very far towards getting the Establishment out of the way, and it is still with us in spite of repeated attacks made upon it from time to time. Perhaps Priestley was right, and this is the reason why our numbers do not increase as rapidly as they might.

For some years past our churches in Birmingham have been steadily working on, free from disturbance by any changes in their ministry, such as have been going on around them, but now their turn has come. The loss of Mr. Jacks from the Church of the Messiah has been very keenly felt by the members of his congregation, but it has not come about in the ordinary way, and they console themselves with the thought that he has not left them to take charge of another congregation, but to devote himself to a calling which may have a wide influence for good upon the young men who will be trained for the ministry at Manchester College. I understand also that Mr. Jacks does not intend to give up preaching, but that his voice, which has been mostly heard in Birmingham for the last nine years in sermons of great eloquence and power, will still be heard occasionally in many of our pulpits throughout the country. Mr. Jacks closed his ministry at the end of September, and on the following Sunday his successor occupied the pulpit in his place. It is too soon to form any estimate of Mr. Austin's success in his new work, and it was difficult for any man to follow so closely after one who occupied the place in the hearts of his congregation which Mr. Jacks occupied. Time will show, but from what I have seen and heard of Mr. Austin I have great hopes for the future of the church under the influence of his ministry. A special meeting to formally welcome him to the church will take place early in December.

Another Birmingham church which is undergoing a change is Newhall Hill. Mr. Charlesworth's resignation will take effect at the end of October, and the future destinies of the church are at present uncertain. He will be a distinct loss to Birmingham, and to the Midland Christian Union in particular, he having filled the post of honorary secretary for close upon ten years with much benefit to that association. His place will be taken by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, of Cradley, till the annual meeting in the spring. There is some talk of our Newhall Hill friends returning to the Church of the Messiah. I say "returning" because as long ago as the year 1834 a number of teachers withdrew from the New Meeting Schools (the predecessor of the Church of the Messiah), and subsequently founded the congregation which afterwards made its home in the church which they built in Newhall Hill. I hope some means will be found of continuing the work Mr. Charlesworth is about to leave behind. It is true that the congregation and schools have diminished in numbers during the last few years, and I understand that other centres of religious life in the vicinity have shared the same fate; but in a populous part of the city such as Newhall Hill a supreme effort should be made before the place is given up. Should this be found to be inevitable and a return be made to the Church of the Messiah, I am sure that church would receive them back with open arms after a separation of nearly seventy years.

Another of the Birmingham churches is at present deprived of its minister. Mr. Wood has been in the United States for rest and change since the end of July, and it is earnestly hoped that he may return home in a few months' time thoroughly refreshed and restored to health, and ready for renewed exertion in the work of his church and the city. Such men are not easily spared from their posts for so long a time. The Rev. J. E. Manning is in charge of the pulpit during his absence, and the responsibilities of the editorial chair of the Seed Sower have been taken by various friendly hands.

Still one more change, I hear, is to be made, and this is at Waverley-road, Small Heath. Though apparently possessed of all the essentials which combine to make a successful church, it has disappointed the hopes of its founders of ten years ago. I hope that Mr. Gorton's successor when he is found may prove equal to the task of establishing on the foundations already laid a healthy and united congregation.

Warwick was chosen for the meeting-place for the autumnal conference of the Union according to the rule for holding it outside Birmingham, and it was held in the chapel there on Monday last. The attendance was but small, and not very inspiriting to those who had taken the trouble to prepare addresses for the occasion. Mr. Pipe's paper on "The Church and Social Problems" kept us all deeply interested for fully an hour in the afternoon. The subject was treated in a thoroughly practical fashion, largely based on his own experience at Fazeley-street for some years past, where he gathers round him in his "drawing-room" meetings and other institutions in the week day, and in the church on the Sunday, many of the poorest and least-cared-for dwellers in a thickly-populated part of Birmingham. No man in this large city can be doing more good for his fellow-creatures than Mr. Pipe, and the true missionary spirit of love and sympathy shone through every page of his admirable paper. It will be printed in due course, and should be found of great use among our churches, especially those in populous districts.

A well-deserved vote of thanks, proposed by our President, Mr. Byng Kenrick, was given to Mr. Charlesworth for his services as secretary, and Mr. McKean was congratulated on his recovery from his accident some time ago. He said he had been quite overcome by the kindness shown to him in various ways while confined to his room and unable to do anything. Our Warwick friends having no schoolroom or church parlour in which to entertain us to tea, Mr. and Mrs. Lakin very kindly invited those attending the Conference to take tea at their house. The attendance at the service in the evening was smaller than the afternoon, but possibly the fact that the town was in the thick of a parliamentary election partly accounted for this. Mr. Manning discoursed to us on "Religion and Theology." The central idea we carried away from hearing Mr. Pipe's paper was, that if we are to draw people into the churches who will not enter them merely to take part in a service of prayer and praise, and listen to a sermon, we must appeal to them by means of social agencies, by giving them something to do in the week-day or perhaps on the Sunday as well, and thus to make them feel that they are contributing by their own efforts to strengthen the religious life of the community, and to leave the world a little better than they found it.

It is on these lines that we should work for the development of our churches in the Midland district, and I would once more emphasise Mr. Wood's eloquent appeal, and urge on our friends throughout the Midlands to bear in mind that every one can do something, however small it may appear, to help to furnish the stall which his or her church will provide, or join with another church in providing at the bazaar to be held in the coming year. And there is not a day to be lost. Everyone should get to work at once. H.

MORE than once I have met death, but without fear. Nor do I fear now. Without being able to demonstrate it, I know that my soul cannot die.—Bayard Taylor.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Belfast: Stanhope Street Domestic Mission.—We have already recorded the re-opening service held on Saturday, October 3. On Sunday evening, October 11, the Rev. Principal Gordon, of Manchester, conducted the service, and preached an eloquent sermon on "Hope." In connection with the mission a sale of work was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, on Friday, October 9. Much of the work offered for sale had been made by the mission people, and was part of their contribution to the building fund. The brief opening ceremony was presided over by the Rev. D. Walmsley, B.A., and Mrs. A. G. Malcolm, than whom the mission has no warmer nor stauncher friend, declared the sale open. In addition to local friends, stalls were provided by ladies of Holywood, York-street, Mountpottinger, Dunmurry, the First Church and Comber. Good business was done, and with a supplementary sale held in the mission on Saturday evening, 10th inst., the sum of £87 was realised.

Belfast, Mount Pottinger (Resignation).—The Rev. W. Jenkin Davies, after seven years of service, has resigned his present charge, and is to start next month with Mrs. Davies on a tour round the world. At the close of the present year the Christian Freeman will be issued under new editorship.

Billingshurst.—The anniversary meetings were held on Monday last. After the usual tea, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie conducted a service, which was greatly appreciated by all present. At a subsequent public meeting, presided over by Rev. George Lansdowne, very encouraging addresses were delivered by Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, J. J. Marten, Messrs. Price, senior, Tarring, and David Price. Several members of the Horsham church were present, and also from the Billingshurst Congregational church. Revs. E. S. Lang, Buckland, A. J. Marchant, and Hoyle Tomlinson (Congregational minister) regretted their absence, and sent warm greetings. Successful harvest services were held at Billingshurst and Wisboro'-green on the day before.

Birmingham: Balsall Heath.—On Sunday, Oct. 11, the fourth anniversary of Our Father's Church was celebrated, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter being the special preacher. The evening address was on "The Gospels and how to read them." The collections for the day amounted to £4 5s. 3d.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school anniversary was associated with the harvest festival on Sunday last. Special hymns and anthems were effectively rendered. The Rev. J. Worthington officiated at all the three services. In the evening seats had to be placed along the aisles to accommodate the crowded congregation. On Monday evening the Rev. James Harwood delivered his lecture on "A Visit to India" to a highly appreciative audience.

Gorton Bicentenary.—The bicentenary of the opening for public worship of the "Old Chapel," known also as Gorton Chapel (now Brookfield Church), was celebrated last Saturday and Sunday by special services. The history of the Old Chapel and its development into the present vigorous congregation at Brookfield is well told in a pamphlet of some fifteen pages lately published by the minister of the church, the Rev. George Evans; and it was further enlarged upon by the Rev. Dendy Agate in his sermon at the unveiling of a memorial tablet on Saturday afternoon. The tablet occupies a prominent position at the chancel end of the church, and is of rich alabaster, beautifully ornamented, from a design by Messrs. Thomas Worthington & Son. The sculptors were Messrs. Hobbs & Miller. The inscription upon the tablet records the fact that it was erected to commemorate the bicentenary of the opening of Gorton Chapel, with the date of the unveiling, and the names of the successive ministers from 1703 to the present date. The unveiling took place during the service conducted by the Rev. George Evans, and was performed by Mr. Samuel Rider, a warm supporter of the church, who, in his address, spoke of the love and esteem in which the memory is held of the whole line of ministers whose names are associated with the old chapel and Brookfield Church. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dendy Agate, from the text, "Our fathers trusted in Thee; they trusted, and Thou didst deliver them," &c. (Ps. xx. 4, 5). He recalled the social condition and natural features of Gorton two hundred years ago, so strangely different from what they are now, and said that the history of Protestant Dissent in that place took them still further back than the establishment of the Old Chapel. People in Gorton, as elsewhere, he said, had begun to strike out their own line in religious matters before Adam Martindale settled there in 1646. The liking of some of the Gorton people for the Independent form of Church government had been maintained through all the changing years; and then, some time about 1703, hopes which many of them had long cherished were realised, and the modest walls of the house of prayer which some of his hearers would remember were reared in faith and thankfulness. He described those old days, and said they might ask what the men were like who founded the Old Chapel. He would not discuss the relative parts which had been played by Independency and Presbyterianism in still earlier days, and the ways in which the two streams at last united. It was enough to remember that those who built the modest house of prayer in Gorton Vale had inherited traditions which they still held dear. Being unable conscientiously to worship at the parish church, they had long held services in dwelling-houses; and they rejoiced when a permanent home was assured to them, and a quiet plot of ground encircling it in which they might lay their beloved dead to rest. The preacher recalled the personal character of successive ministers and of the more prominent laymen who had been associated with the church's work in Gorton. "All honour," he said, "to those who founded this congregation, and who, having served it in any way, passed onward when their work was done. We who knew him and worshipped with him here shall never forget the generous, kindly, and large-hearted donor of this church. We know how he would have rejoiced with us in this service of commemoration, for he had a high regard for the traditions of the past; and the continued strength and progress of both congregation and Sunday-school were very dear to him." After the service tea was served in the handsome schoolroom, which has been recently decorated and in the evening a meeting was held in the same place, over which the Rev. George Evans presided. Interesting historical addresses were given by the chairman, Principal Gordon, and the Rev. Dendy Agate; and music was contributed by the organist and members of the choir. On Sunday morning Principal Gordon was the preacher, and in the evening the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. With regard to the tablet, although there was universal admiration of the beautiful material of which it was composed, and also of the fine carving displayed in working out the design, there was an equally universal feeling that it was exceedingly bad art to daub over such exquisite marble with red and green paint in order to make its roses and leaves look realistic—which of course they did not. One can hardly suppose that our Gorton friends will long allow such a rich piece of marble to be thus disfigured.

London: Islington.—The Rev. E. Savell Hicks, M.A., lately assistant minister of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of Unity Church, and will enter on his duties on November 1.

London: Kilburn.—Harvest Festival Services were held in the Quex-road Church, on Sunday, October 11. In spite of the inclement weather, there were good congregations, morning and evening. On Wednesday, 14th inst., the Rev. and Mrs. J. E. Stronge held a reception in the Hall, to meet Mr. Alderman and Mrs. Fleetwood Pritchard, the Mayor and Mayoress of Hampstead. There was a large gathering of members of the congregation, and many outside friends. On Tuesday, 20th inst., the opening lecture of the Session of the Quex-road Unity Club was given by Mr. F. Womack, B.Sc., on "Wireless Telegraphy"; and there was a large audience, the hall being comfortably full. The winter's work has begun in this district in a most encouraging way, and gives good hope of a successful season.

London: Stepney.—Morning service and Sunday-school last Sunday was conducted by Mr. George Ward; the evening discourse by Rev. C. A. Ginever, being on "National Well-being and The Trade." He urged the consecration of votes to the highest issues, and the logical position of local option as a means of efficiently dealing with the liquor traffic.

Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches.—The twelfth of the visits of the governing body was paid to Moss Side on Saturday, October 10. The service was conducted by Rev. J. A. Pearson, and the sermon preached by Rev. S. A. Stainthal, who fairly communicated to his congregation his confidence and hope. Two hundred and thirty people were at the service, and though the composition of the audience was different, the same number were at the public meeting. Mr. Piggott presided, and addresses were given by Rev. Dendy Agate, Rev. Charles Roper, and Mr. Councillor R. G. Lawson. One of the good things about these meetings is the delightful surprise we may at any time receive from a good speaker of whom we have, as a body, known nothing before. Mr. Lawson provided the surprise at Moss Side, and everyone present wishes for him a life of usefulness, not only in public affairs, but in the religious connection to which he belongs. The welcome on behalf of the congregation was given by Mr. Pimley, and musical items were rendered by Miss Macdonald, Mr. Arthur Baker and Mr. Hindley.

Manchester (Chorlton-cum-Hardy).—On Saturday, October 17, a congregational social evening was held in the schoolroom in connection with the approaching removal of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur E. Piggott and family to Chinley. Mr. Piggott's name will be well known to all who have been connected in recent years with the Manchester District Association, or who worked for the grand bazaar of 1897 to provide funds for the Forward Movement which established churches at Chorlton, Heaton Moor, Bradford, and Urmston. The Rev. J. Ruddle presided at the meeting, and spoke with warm appreciation of Mr. Piggott's services to the church. Mr. E. H. Hiller, chairman of committee, followed with the presentation of a handsome table lamp to Mr. and Mrs. Piggott and of books to their children. He referred to the impulses supplied by Mr. Piggott, which had helped the church forward during thirteen years, to the valued services rendered as treasurer, secretary, organist, and member of committee. Mr. Robert C. Law referred to his earliest association with Mr. Piggot, when he, a complete stranger living at Stretford, received the astonishing suggestion that they two should start a movement at Chorlton. In view of the fact that neither of them knew any other Unitarian at Chorlton, this was a courageous proposition, but in the result had been amply justified. He wished to bear testimony to the example afforded by Mr. Piggott's enthusiasm, his gentle and able methods and to his sincere religious life. Mr. Harrop followed and laid stress on closing of the ranks, and urged all present to take care that Mr. Piggott should find his work had been of permanent value to the church. Mr. Piggott, in reply, said that whatever he had done had been a labour of love, and that such questions as to whether the work was too arduous, or involved too much anxiety, had never presented themselves seriously to him. A conviction that behind all there was a Power making for righteousness entered into the texture of his life, and consequently he had always been upheld under circumstances of difficulty in church, home, and business. He had found friendship, love, and happiness in the work, and had been especially helped by regular attendance at the Sunday services. The expressions which had fallen from previous speakers were from old and sincere friends, and the friendship and esteem indicated were heartily reciprocated. In conclusion he would only ask any who appreciated his past work of service to the church to try and give aid in a similar way wherever practicable.

Rawtenstall Jubilee Bazaar.—On October 8-10 the jubilee bazaar was held in the schoolroom. The present chapel was opened on October 2, 1853. The Rev. George Harris, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, preached in the morning and evening, and the Rev. J. Cropper, of Stand, in the afternoon. The opening services were continued on October 9. The Rev. James Martineau, of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, preached in the morning and evening, and the Rev. W. Gaskell, M.D., of Manchester, in the afternoon. Mr. Martineau and Mr. Gaskell preached from the same text. The object of the bazaar was to raise the sum of £1,000, so as to relieve the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission of the necessity of making a grant for the support of the church. The depressed state of trade and the inclement weather militated against the success of the effort, which nevertheless proved fairly successful. The bazaar was opened on the 8th by Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington Hall, in very felicitous terms. The appointed chairman, Mr. James Lupton, of Chorley, owing to ill-health, was not able to be present, but was worthily represented by his nephew, Mr. James Lupton, of Accrington. On the 9th the opening function was performed by Mr. Thomas Harwood, of Bolton, the President of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. The vice-chairman of the Mission Committee, the Rev. J. J. Wright, was the appointed chairman, but by medical advice he is compelled to take a rest. The Rev. J. C. Odgers, of Bury, very kindly consented to act in the capacity of chairman. On Saturday the opening ceremony was performed in an eloquent speech by Mr. W. Healey, J.P., of Heywood. The chair was taken by Mr. Alfred Ashworth, of Clough Fold, a member of the Newchurch congregation. There were present the Revs. R. Travers Herford, J. J. Shaw, W. H. Burgess, and Jenkyn Thomas, the minister of the church: Messrs. Ramsbottom (secretary), Halstead (treasurer), Holden, and others. A very pleasant feature was the stall provided by the Newchurch congregation and school. Miss Gertrude Martineau sent a beautiful water-colour drawing of Loch-au-Eilan, painted by herself. The drawing was sold for eight guineas, and bought by the scholars and friends and the chairman of the first day, and presented to the school as a memento of the fiftieth anniversary, and of the visit paid by Dr. Martineau to the church. The bazaar was continued on Monday, and the total amount realised by donations, sales, &c., for the Independence Fund is now £733 3s. 0½d.

South Wales Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meetings were held at Llandyssul, on Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 13 and 14. Despite the stormy weather and heavy rains, large congregations assembled at each of the four meetings. On Tuesday evening the devotional service was conducted by the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, and the Revs. J. P. Kane and David Rees preached eloquent sermons. The business meeting was held on Wednesday morning, when the chair was taken by the President, Rev. David Evans, Cribyn. Several minor matters were discussed and settled, afterwards the secretary, Rev. W. James, read a letter from the Rev. D. Evans, Cribyn, one of the editors of the Ymofnydd, resigning his post as joint-editor, through ill-health. The resignation was received with much regret, and warm expressions of thanks for the valuable services rendered. It was unanimously resolved that the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul, should be asked to fill the vacancy, which he consented to do. The question of ministerial supply of the Welsh churches in its relation to the Carmarthen College was partially discussed, but adjourned to the next quarterly meetings to be held at Alltyplaca next Easter. Arrangements were made for starting the Welsh Postal Mission, of which the Rev. Lewis Williams, Rhydygwin, is the secretary. The religious service was conducted by the Rev. John Davies, and the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., preached the appointed sermon, his subject being "Why am I a Unitarian?" At the close of the sermon a very interesting presentation was made to the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., Green Park. Mr. Thomas is the oldest Unitarian minister in Wales, if not in England also, and retired from the ministry nearly ten years ago. He was also master of the Pontshan Grammar School for many years, an institution in direct line of succession from the school kept in the same neighbourhood by the well-known Unitarian minister and Welsh bard and scholar, Davis of Castle Howell. The presentation to Mr. Thomas was of an illuminated address, congratulating him on the completion of his four-score years. It was a touching scene, all the ministers and most of the laity present had at one time sat under his ministry or at his feet as guide, philosopher, and friend. The address was couched in most appropriate terms, expressive of the most tender affection and regard, and recalling the great services which Mr. Thomas had rendered to the cause of religion, education, and of public progress generally, and was signed by thirty-one names, being those of Welshmen in the Unitarian ministry. The presentation was made by the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare, and congratulatory speeches, which were delightfully reminiscent and at times touching, were made by the Rev. John Davies, Alltyplaca; W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul; R. C. Jones, Lampeter; T. Lloyd Jones, Liverpool; and T. Arthur Thomas, the present minister at Pantdefaid. Mr. Thomas made an appropriate reply, thanking all for the honour shown to him that day. Preaching services were again held in the afternoon and evening, when sermons were delivered by the Revs. T. J. Jenkins, J. Hathren Davies, R. C. Jones, and John Davies. The Revs. D. R. Davies and David Rees introduced the services.

In this book an attempt has been made to get nearer to the meaning of the original by omitting some passages now held by many students to be interpolations, and also by first comparing several translations in order to select that word or phrase which seemed to convey the truest sense. It is hoped that by this means the great beauty, and wonderful teaching of this ancient masterpiece may be brought more clearly before the notice of the general reader.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR readers will observe from the report of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the Council, that the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., will deliver a course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" at Nottingham, beginning on Monday, November 2; at Lewisham on Tuesday, November 3, and at Richmond, on Wednesday, November 4. Copies of the syllabus may be obtained from the respective ministers or secretaries at these places. The opportunity of hearing such a course of lectures is one that should not be missed by anyone who is interested in recent developments of Christian doctrine.

IT is many years since anything in the way of Unitarian lectures or services was done at Cambridge, and the experiment about to be made there by the Committee will be watched with interest. Mr. Carpenter will deliver a course of four Sunday evening lectures in the Cambridge Guildhall on "The Gospels, and how to Read Them," beginning on November 8. If any of our readers who have relatives or acquaintances in Cambridge likely to be interested in such a course of lectures, we hope they will at once send their names and addresses to Essex Hall, so that cards may be forwarded to them.

THE arrangements for the autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Manchester are now completed. The local committee have prepared a thoroughly good and practical programme. The meetings will be held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, November 10, 11, and 12. The Rev. Frank Walters will preach the sermon at Cross-street Chapel, on Tuesday afternoon. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal will preside at a great meeting in the Free Trade Hall, on Tuesday evening, when addresses will be delivered by the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, J. Page Hopps, James C. Street, W. Copeland Bowie (secretary of the Association), and others.

AT the conference to be held on Wednesday morning and afternoon, papers will be read on "The Propagation of our Unitarian Faith," by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, "City Churches and the Theory of Independency," by the Rev. Charles Peach, "The Strengthening of our Congregational Life," by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin and Mr. J. Wigley, and "A Church of the Present," by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas. "The Responsibilities of Church and Sunday-school towards each other" will form the topic of the Conference on Thursday morning. Mrs. Manning will deal with the question from the school point of view, Mr. R. Robinson from the Church point of view. There will be a conversazione in the new Midland Hall on Wednesday evening. A programme so interesting and varied will doubtless attract a large gathering from near and far.

THE Education Committee of the National Federation of the Evangelical Free Church Councils has drawn up the heads of a "scheme for national education," to be submitted to the larger body. It is an uncompromising assertion of the right and intention of opponents of sectarianism in education, released by the action of the other side from the compromise of 1870, to establish once and for all a system of complete and universal popular control over popularly supported education, with the absolute exclusion of all theological tests. But difficulty has already arisen over clause 7 of the scheme, which, after providing that "no distinctively denominational teaching or formulary shall be given or used in public schools in school hours," adds that "simple Biblical instruction may be given according to a syllabus." Everything, of course, turns on the question what "simple Biblical instruction" means. It will be sad if all instruction in the contents of our greatest classic has to be forbidden in our public schools on account of the difficulty of excluding dogmatic interpretations of its text. But unless the Free Church Federation finds words at a later stage to show that such exclusion is the desire of its members, they can hardly expect to find general support for this part of their programme among educational reformers when a "final" settlement is under discussion.

THE quotation from the Bishop of Worcester's Congress Sermon, in our leading article last week, was made from a condensed report. The actual words used by the preacher, which are now accessible, yield even more clearly than the imperfect version then before us the inference which we ventured to draw from it. At the same time, they express very forcibly that ethical view of the responsibility involved in creed-recitation which was put forward, again and again, by Dr. Martineau as his ground of his disagreement with the Broad Church. Dr. Gore said:—

> There must be no compromise as regards the fundamental creed. When the clergy, as representatives and mouthpieces of the Church, stand, saying "I believe," there must be no doubt that they mean what they say. No doubt other requirements besides the Creed are made upon their belief, but they are vaguer. . . . I repeat, then, the most definite dogmatic requirement is that involved in the continual public recitation of the Creeds. "I believe that Jesus Christ is very God, of one substance with the Father, who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven and was incarnate—that He was born of the Virgin Mary, and that He rose the third day from the dead," are phrases which admit of no ambiguity. The last quoted clauses simply assert that the historical records which contain the narratives of the Birth and Resurrection of Christ are true in fact.

Now we are in our days challenged [he proceeds] by a not unimportant group of men to admit the legitimacy of the recitation of these words by clergymen who, at the least, regard, for example, the Virgin birth as highly doubtful. Now I say quite deliberately: Let us be very gentle with scrupulous and anxious consciences. Let us be very patient with men under trial of doubt. But when a man has once arrived at a conviction that he cannot honestly affirm a particular article of the Creed, the meaning of which is unambiguous, to be true, let the public conscience of the Church tell him that he cannot qualify to be an officer of the Church which makes a public recitation of the personal belief in this, among other articles, a central element in its great acts of worship. What has been challenged in this matter is the public conscience. It is the public conscience which is asked to weaken the obligation of belief by consciously allowing an unreal sense of explicit words. Let the public conscience, therefore, reply to the challenge as explicitly as possible.

On this question, which as a question of morality is much more important than any question of opinion about historic fact, it is well to have the emphatic and unequivocal authority of Dr. Gore on our side.

DR. BERNARD, Dean of St. Patrick's, spoke at the Church Congress on "The Interpretation of the Creeds, as Affected by the Newer Historical Methods." He accepts—as results of the methods of comparison, analysis, and investigation of sources—the secondary character of the first and third gospels, and of the discourses in the fourth gospel. In his concluding paragraph occur these two sentences:—

> The two great articles of the Resurrection and the Virgin Birth can never be acceptable to, or possible for, those who cannot believe the Christ of the Church to be more than man.
> I make bold to say that these two articles are no whit less credible than of old to those who recognise in Christ the Incarnation of the Divine.

In other words, these dogmata are credible to those, and those alone, who already hold the view that Jesus was, in a special biological sense, a unique being, "more than man." On what basis such a presupposition can rest, apart from these miracles, Dr. Bernard does not disclose. Not, of course, in the moral excellence of Jesus' life and teaching; for they are irrelevant to the biological question. This position gains an increasing number of supporters every year, and it cannot be long before a large proportion of them take the next step, that of examining the basis of their presupposition. "It is the presuppositions," as Dr. Sanday says of Harnach and Wernle, "which need a far more serious testing than they have ever received." A little more critical sincerity, and a little more honesty in matters of creed-recitation, will together do wonders for the progress of English Christendom.

Dr. HORTON, in the course of his presidential address to the Congregational Union, delivered an incidental attack on the Encyclopædia Biblica, which he regards at once as a monument of prodigious learning and as "the punishment for a wrong preoccupation of the Church." He regrets, e.g., that Schmiedel has not spent his time "preaching Christ to the Chinese, instead of showing that we have none of the Master's words to preach." This, by the way, is not an entirely accurate description, but the paragraph in which it occurs seems to indicate that, in Dr. Horton's opinion, criticism of the documents and history of Christianity is of secondary or of no value. It is interesting to notice that another distinguished leader of Congregational thought, Dr. K. C. Anderton, has entered a protest against this tendency to depreciate scientific inquiry, and points out that there is "a real danger that the missionary interest may become identified with reaction in theology." But while there is undoubtedly this danger of theological reaction, it is well to recognise that there are strong forces in Congregationalism moving towards freedom, which are bound to throw off the incubus of fear as they have escaped from the burden of an establishment and a creed.

THE duty of the Church to those without, especially in relation to what are known as social questions, was dealt with by the Rev. Bertram Smith, of Leeds, at the Congregational Union meetings. He suggested that every minister should serve a seven years' apprenticeship among the poor, in order that he might be brought "face to face with the pressing problems of poverty and social injustice." Mr. Smith, who himself has served more than seven years amid the poverty of the Hunslet district, is driven to the conclusion that the social question is the question of the hour. This is indeed a test of the standing or the falling Church. The problems of modern life are pressing and serious, and a living Church should be able to direct and inspire the efforts for reformation. With or without this guidance the efforts are being made, and the world will suffer as well as the Church if the influence of the latter is unfelt.

AN admirably sympathetic criticism of the religious life of China appeared as a leading article in the Free Methodist last week. It is freely acknowledged that there is much soundness—religious sentiment and moral truth—at the heart of that great nation; and some indications, worth heeding, are given to aid the learner to recognise that fact. The minor Methodist bodies represented by this paper have sent, and are sending, Christian missionaries to China, and nothing better could be wished for them than that they should enter upon their work in the frank and kindly spirit manifested in the leader we have named.

THE interesting experiment in co-operative building known as the Ealing Tenants, Ltd., is now firmly rooted, as a valuable contribution to the solution of the great housing question. The roads already laid out are fully occupied; and the company appeals for increased share capital. This will not return a large interest on the investment, which seems, however, to be a safe one. The tenants are required to be shareholders. This scheme has two advantages over the ordinary building society. The members do not buy their own houses, but become part owners in a common property. From this follows the other benefit that if a tenant moves into another district he has not the anxiety that attaches to a small house property which he cannot personally superintend.

MR. W. H. LECKY, whose death occurred on the 23rd inst., occupied a position that commanded respect even from those whose opinions differed from his. Born in 1838, and intended from early years to hold a "family living" near Cork, he found himself in early manhood unable to adhere to the faith of his fathers. This result was largely attributable to the pernicious policy of the Tractarians, who, in their zeal for ecclesiastical claims, provoked the critical inquiries of candid minds, inquiries which not seldom, as in Lecky's case, ended in revolt. His first important work, "The Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe," showed that at the early age of twenty-seven he had surveyed wide fields of history, sacred and secular, and that he possessed a singularly lucid and judicial mind. These characteristics were even more marked in the great work on the "Eighteenth Century," the opening volumes of which followed in his fortieth year. His moderation and fairness in dealing with vexed questions of policy, which have still an intimate bearing on our national and social conditions, have been recognised on all sides.

LIKE many another of his contemporaries, Mr. Lecky lived long enough to see the ardent liberalism of the mid-century fade into hesitation and doubts more and more pronounced. Something of the mood of Tacitus supervened, and it became as difficult for him to trust democracy as it was impossible to accept the propositions of the Church. Even so, however, his gentle temperament kept him from that excess of scolding which betrays the prophet doubtful of his own oracle. Men heard his graceful periods with an interest which would have been greater had he exercised a simpler though a ruder form of oratory; but the effect of his contribution to the wisdom of our legislators was chiefly felt by those whose minds lie open to the appeal of quiet and studious reasoning. Such men as he are needed in an age too much surrendered to the noisy demagogue. We may easily forgive the chill they sometimes give to our enthusiasms when we remember the permanent need of a little more sanity in public affairs.

As a poet, Mr. Lecky was not widely known, but those who have read the collection ("Poems," 1891) which he gleaned from the verses of many years are well aware of his merits and demerits in this line of work. Usually, his lines run smoothly, and his ear is correct, and while his range of versification is not wide, it proves adequate alike to themes lighter and graver. As might be expected, the latter predominate, and it must be confessed the general effect is depressing. A muse, rosy and robust, must breathe another atmosphere than that of the chamber where men sift the ashes of dead generations. When we turn to the last poem in the book, we get Lecky's "Conclusion of the Whole Matter," in lines which readers will appreciate according to their mood. This is his summing up:—

> Still the world seems mounting higher,
> Chasing unfulfilled desire,
> Spurning barrier, prop, and chain,
> Scattering darkness, conquering pain,
> Winning much—but in each prize
> Some sad germ of evil lies;
> For the subtle taint that blends
> With all human hopes and ends,
> Making good the seed of ill,
> Rules the course of nations still.
> Progress comes, but she will wake
> Cravings more than she can slake;
> Wealth increasing, soon will grow
> Idle, joyless, tasteless show;
> Freedom's dawn proves weak and vain
> When the rhetoricians reign,
> When the path to honour lies
> With the many, not the wise;
> Knowledge lends new power still
> To the thought, but not the will,
> And she scarce can cast a ray
> On the future's clouded way;
> While old Time in triumph leads > Shattered causes, hopes, and creeds.

MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS.

DISCUSSION.

IV.

MR. BARROW deserves the thanks of all interested in Domestic Mission Work, by the thoughtful manner in which he discusses its aims and objects, and although they may not arrive at the same results as he does, his arguments and illustrations cannot fail to be suggestive. I doubt, however, whether the ideal which underlies his conception of what Dr. Tuckerman called "The Ministry at Large," has ever been attained; I feel quite sure it was not the one which the first organiser of Domestic Missions pursued.

In Mr. George W. Cooke's "Unitarianism in America," published by the American Unitarian Association in 1902, there is a chapter on "The Ministry at Large," describing the earliest steps taken in the establishment of the effort in 1822 by some young men in Boston. Their first step was the establishment of a Sunday-school, and in a month's time there was added "preaching for the poor and those connected with no religious organisation." Dr. Tuckerman gave up his settled ministry owing to illness, and in 1826 devoted his rare gifts to this new form of work, entering on his new duties on November 5 of that year.

He began at once by visiting the poor and studying their condition, but in less than a month he records in his diary that he was preaching "to a large and very attentive audience." Judging from reports which I have heard, and records which I have read, Dr. Tuckerman was a strong believer in personal influence, and felt that by personal intercourse with those unconnected with ecclesiastical organisations he could re-awaken the associations in the religious institutions that had existed in most of the poor, or be able to kindle into activity the latent germs of loving trust which he believed would be found amongst the most ignorant and sinful.

It can easily be imagined, that while every minister who has a faith like this would, if he could, re-unite the links which had connected the lapsed to their spiritual home, he would do so as the most efficient aid he could give, but many would prefer to listen to the voice which had recalled them to the light or awakened it in their souls. Thus, the better the missionary does his work, the more inevitable is it that he gathers a congregation round him. And just as the congregation, so do all the other institutions spring up: first the religious, and then, I trust, with the religious spirit underlying and inspiring all, the economical, the educational, and recreational agencies which now surround all our domestic stations.

I cannot see that missionary work is not social work, nor do I think that the social worker cannot touch, much less does not seek to touch, the individual life within. The true reformer must know that it is only by individual improvement that social progress can be attained; it is the spring of all his encouragement. He cannot change mankind, but he may convert a man. And thus I feel that our Domestic Missions, if the minister and the many helpers who naturally gather round every true worker, always were, and will always be, aiming at the one great purpose which Tuckerman made his work, to give his help to all who were in need of his service, while every method, by which that aim can be attained, is the rightful one to be adopted.

Mr. Barrow would sever all almsgiving from the functions of the minister. His argument applies not merely to the minister of the Domestic Mission, but to all religious workers. If the minister makes himself a relieving officer, I have no doubt he does degrade his sacred office, but I think if he has by personal visiting become a friend in a poor man's house, becoming acquainted with the characters of the household, their circumstances and their needs, he will be a better judge as to whether food, clothing, actual money, or other forms of help are needed, than the casual visitor of the best charity organisation society can, and the brotherly sympathy which will find expression in his gift will avoid the pauperising taint which inevitably accompanies an official dole.

I am not in favour of abolishing the poor's purse, but experience has made me well aware that there is hardly any part of a minister's duty more difficult to fulfil, than the judicious use of the poor's purse. Mr. Barrow is right in his strong advice to encourage independence, and I hope that everyone connected with mission work will always bear that advice in mind. I do not wish to touch any personal matters, or I think I could point out, in more instances than some imagine, proofs of the good seed sown by our Domestic Missions of this virtue, and of the growing life it is manifesting.

There is much more that I could add, but space forbids. Those who are busily engaged in the actual work which is being done to-day in our Domestic Missions are the ones who have most faith in their usefulness. But they are also the very ones who must face the lack of workers in the mission field. They welcome the generous help which is given by a few in contributions of money and money's worth, but they feel that "the fields are already white unto harvest," but "the labourers are few." I hope this public consideration of Domestic Mission work may lead some, as yet unattached, to visit the mission districts. They will there find many methods by which they will be able to promote the high aim which the Domestic Mission in them all keeps steadily in view; the establishment of the kingdom of Heaven among men.

S. ALFRED STEINTHAL.

V.

MR. BARROW has introduced a subject of great importance to our notice. He has had the courage to express the thoughts of many hearts. His paper is a challenge to us not to defend what has been done in the past, but to realise what we are leaving undone in the present.

I find myself on the whole in such cordial agreement with what he says, that there is very little which I can add to the discussion.

(1) I take it that there is a tendency in our missions to crystallise into respectable congregations of poor people, and in consequence, more and more time and energy are devoted to the needs of those who are within the fold. We are not, I believe, reaching the unchurched, the loafer, the vagrant, or the degraded poor as we ought to be doing, if we are true to our aims.

(2) For a great many people—and the feeling increases as they sink in the social scale—the mission church is taboo, like every other place of worship associated with pews, and Sunday clothes, and an indefinable air of patronage. This seems to be one of the inherent defects of Protestantism. The difficulty does not exist with a Catholic population. But then, the Roman Catholic does not build cheap, lower-grade churches for the poor.

(3) I believe that the attempt to win people to religion by trying to awaken their interest in something else has failed, and always must fail. Rich people must give up the most unchristian fallacy that the poor need coal-tickets, and concerts, and clubs in order to make them interested in religion. These things do not touch their sins and sorrows, and the aching hunger of the soul for God. Unfortunately, to many of us, physical poverty appeals far more than spiritual destitution. We are more unhappy about starved bodies than dead souls. Many serious people are beginning to ask themselves whether the social side of the church, with its cultivation of pleasure and its tendency to measure religious success by secular excitements, has not been overdone. We seem to trust less and less to the convincing power of the Gospel, as a message spoken, simply and directly, to the soul.

(4) What I have said does not mean that we must disband our present missions. The work they are doing is good. They must go on preaching to the people who will come. They must also continue and develop their varied social enterprises, till some other agency is ready to take them out of their hands and leave them free for more distinctly religious effort. But, meanwhile, there is another work which they are doing very imperfectly, if, indeed, in many instances, they are doing it at all. Have we the faith and courage to put men down as spiritual pioneers in the waste places of our great cities, and to say to them, "Go and work amongst all this unorganised mass of human life; ask for no tabulated report on numerical results; we set you free for the invisible work of the pioneer?" And given this opportunity, are there men amongst us to hear the call, prepared to enlist in this honourable service, anxious to live the life of the poor, that through their poverty they may become rich? There is much in all this which is at variance with our ideal of the professional ministry, with a comfortable suburban church as the height of its ambition. It is the old appeal to Christian chivalry, which covets the hard place of service nearest to the Master's side.

W. H. DRUMMOND.

VI.

Mr. BARROW's able and thoughtful address is sure to give rise to differences of opinion, and at your request

I venture my own opinion on the subject.

The writer, after referring to the way in which the Domestic Mission of to-day, with its schools, services, clubs, associations, and institutions of various kinds, has grown out of the original simplicity of a mission to the homes, asks: "Does a mission church as effectively meet that particular need, to deal with which the Domestic Mission—a mission without a church—was instituted?" I gather that the writer thinks it does not. He thinks "a mission church must in time suffer, as all churches suffer, from its own respectability. There are thousands upon thousands of the labouring class around us who are not ready for religious association, cannot possibly take part in collective worship." Such is undoubtedly the case; but the influence of the missionary in very many cases stimulates to readiness and desire for such association. There is no necessary antagonism between the attempt to "restore" and the attempt to re-organise the lapsed. Rather does it seem natural that restoration should be followed by organisation. The institution of public worship is an indication that the missionary has so far been successful in his work. Having become the friend and adviser of his neighbours they come to his services and send their children to his classes, when but for his personal influence they would have been strangers to all religious associations. Looked at from this point of view, organisation, when practicable, would seem to be inevitable, and there are many congregations of humble folk to-day in neighbourhoods where but for the Domestic Missionary there would have been no congregations at all. We might have built our premises and opened wide the doors, but without the house to house visitation, with its friendships and confidences, there would have been no organised result.

But is it necessary to organise? Should not the missionary keep to his visiting and, having quickened the dormant religious life, urge it to find place and expression in churches already established? All experience of work among the poor is against such a theory. Like the Domestic Missionary, the City Missionary was originally sent forth with this aim. But he, too, has found it essential to have his little room and his little service to which he can invite his brothers and sisters for religious fellowship. He finds that they gladly come to him when they will attend no other place for worship.

Why should it be "of the essence of a mission that it should frequently change its ground?" The migratory character of the population in most of the poorer districts gives quite sufficient change. Does any one of our missionaries feel that he has worked his district so thoroughly that there is no more evangelising to do? He is more likely to be depressed when he sees so much remaining to be done. He is not so zealous in organisation that he will neglect the most important work of influencing heart and life to turn the sinner from the error of his way. This is his first duty. All else is but auxiliary. The routine work of clubs, recreations, &c., he will leave as far as possible to others, and my own experience is that he will obtain help in these directions when he finds it difficult to obtain help for purely religious ends. While others are occupied with the social work he will be employed chiefly in the work of spiritual regeneration. That he does not take a more active part in those special efforts—"in the street at midnight, or at the prison gate at early morning"—is due not to want of will, but to the fact that one man can do so little where there is so much to be done. With the contention that the primary work of the missionary is not social I fully agree. But I cannot see that he ought not to use these instrumentalities in furtherance of his spiritual aim, "To touch the individual life, the soul within." I do not recognise the force of the contention why, given a staff of social workers, a choice should be made between social and religious methods. We need not contrast the methods of Oxford House and of Toynbee. I know something of the salutary work of both. When I was minister of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, I never felt hampered by the fact that through all our agencies—and we were to all intents and purposes a religious settlement—we avowedly sought and placed in the foreground the moral and spiritual uplifting of those who came under our influence. Why should the social and educational part of the work be left outside the sphere of religious influence? Does not a truly religious spirit impel us to social activity? I have ever believed and taught that no Christian Church is true to its name unless it is missionary in the fullest sense of the word, attempting to dispel all surrounding darkness.

With the writer's views on the economic question I am in agreement to a great extent. Speaking, however, of what I know, the missionary of liberal religion does not offer a bribe to induce attendance at his services. At the church and mission already referred to as best known to me, the missionary has always been in close connection with the local branch of the C.O.S., and so far as practicable has used its machinery or followed its methods. With the dole system, of which such a sorry illustration is given, I have no sympathy; but such convalescent work and such provision of adequate and permanent allowances in old age and chronic sickness as make the chief claim upon our poor's purse surely do not tend to pauperise. Moreover, there are cases in which to offer spiritual ministrations without making any attempt to relieve bodily hunger would seem a task too difficult for one who believes in human brotherhood and in the leadership of him who compassionated physical infirmity in those to whom he brought his spiritual message.

That our mission churches are "provided" is quite true. It would be better, no doubt, if all sorts and conditions of men paid for everything of which they make use. As such is not, nor is likely to be the case, we must provide for our brethren who do not—may I not say cannot—provide for themselves. How much of the education, secular and religious, to-day is provided? Are there not churches provided for the wealthy, provided by their ancestors perhaps, as well as missions for the poor provided by annual subscriptions?

That the missionary should live among his people I heartily agree, and I envy the Established Church its parochial system, and its parsonage houses among the people. The system has its drawbacks. The health of the missionary, or of his wife and family, may suffer, and changes of sphere may be occasioned more frequently than is beneficial to the mission. Still the advantages, I am persuaded, more than counterbalance the disadvantages. Wherever possible it is well that the missionary should, as at Mansford-street and some other of our stations, live on the spot among the people to whom he ministers.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAY PREACHING.

SIR,—Like your correspondent, Mr. E. Wilkes-Smith, I too was impressed with the very brief report you gave of the paper by Mr. T. Elliott, on "Lay Preaching, its use in Church Work." I believe the question of lay preaching to be a practical matter of profound significance to the continued vitality of Unitarianism as an organised religious force in this country; and I write on behalf of many earnest and thoughtful laymen in the district in which I live, and in which a number of lay preachers are endeavouring to do a little to promote the religion of freedom and the larger outlook, to which your valuable journal is devoted.

We all feel that we have a message, a gospel, which the people need and even want, one which the common people would hear gladly, as in the days of the Master, if only it were presented to them. But we fail to reach them, partly, I fear, because we are too respectable; and also partly, perhaps mainly, because our religion is too expensive. The "one church one minister" principle, as stated by Mr. Wilkes-Smith in his letter, will never enable us to touch the masses. If we are determined to succeed only at the rate of £200 or £250 per annum per Mission Station, we may make up our minds to miserable failure.

A great many of our poorer churches, which are not paying their way under present conditions, are nevertheless doing good work; and if some means could be devised of relieving them from the everlasting grind, the "intolerable strain," the pressing need for money which taxes three-fourths of their energies, much of that energy might, under the direction and stimulus of earnest and self-sacrificing ministers, be guided into channels making for the social and spiritual uplifting of the people.

We have tried to live to ourselves already too long; we shall find our salvation, as true salvation is always and only found, in forgetting ourselves, and in working, and giving, and praying for others.

There are many points I should have liked to touch upon, but the limits of your space forbid my attempting it in this letter. May I express a hope that your columns will be kept open for some time for the consideration of this vital question, when other, and abler, and more experienced men than I am may discuss with some fulness such questions as (1) its advantage to the ministers themselves, (2) the stimulus it would give to the supply of suitable young men for the ministry, (3) the demand it would speedily create for more ministers, (4) the improved devotional tone which would undoubtedly be the result in the pews, (5) the improvement which might possibly take place in our ministers' preaching, owing to the friendly rivalry of intelligent and earnest laymen.

I conclude this letter by expressing my agreement with Mr. Elliott and Mr. Wilkes-Smith, that in some adaptation—not the slavish adoption, which would be impossible amongst us—but in some adaptation to our special needs and characteristics of the Methodist Circuit System, shall we find our way out of the comparative failure which has hitherto attended our efforts to establish organised centres of Unitarian influence.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN S. MACKIE.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space in your columns in order to speak of the present needs of Winifred House, for just now the funds are not in a very flourishing condition.

Although many of your readers know a great deal about the work that has been carried on for nearly thirteen years in Caroline Hampson's Memorial Home—and indeed it is to them that we are chiefly indebted for our practical support—yet it is necessary from time to time to say something of our aim and methods, not only to justify our existence, but also in order to win new friends for our Invalid Children's Nursing Home, to take the place of those whom death has called away.

We are sometimes asked what kind of cases we take into Winifred House, and as perhaps the best way of answering the question is to speak of one or two typical cases, I will refer to two children who have been with us lately, as illustrations of our work.

The first of these, Jimmy, came to us in the early summer, pale, miserably thin, and "not able to eat anything," his mother said. He had had pneumonia, and consumption was feared. However, a few weeks of wholesome feeding, early hours, and watchful care produced a wonderful change, and the boy's appetite became all that could be desired; so that after a three months' stay, his mother bore him back in triumph, telling us that she had informed her neighbours that they would not know her boy when they saw him, he looked so strong and well. Before leaving, she begged to know how we made our rice puddings, for Jimmy had said how good they were, and she wanted to make some like them. It is now a couple of months since the boy left us, and we hear that he is still quite well, and has been to school daily ever since.

The other child, Ethel, about whom I want to say a few words, is a surgical case, and may have to remain for a year or more, perhaps. She was in hospital with hip disease, and the discharge was sapping her strength so much that the surgeon feared that the limb would have to be amputated. The doctor of our Home, to whom he spoke, exclaimed, "I believe if Miss Hope had that child at Winifred House it might be possible to save the leg"; and the surgeon at once urged that she should be got into our Home if possible, and for the last six weeks she has been there.

Thus far, things are progressing even beyond our most sanguine expectations; our lady superintendent's great skill in antiseptic treatment, on the one hand, and her trained eyesight and loving sympathy—which enable her to note adverse symptoms and combat them in their earliest stage—on the other, have already begun to bear good fruit; the little one has gained considerably in weight (four pounds in the first month), her face has completely lost its pained expression, and she is most contented and happy. Of course, it must be long before we can speak with assurance of ultimate recovery, but the knowledge of the advance already made fills our hearts with a hope which we are glad to believe is "reasonable."

We do not mean to assert—I wish we could!—that all our cases are as inspiring as the two referred to above, but we may fairly claim that the condition of almost every inmate has been improved by its stay, and that the majority of our little invalids have been materially benefited thereby. So that, although we cannot point to large numbers, as can many other institutions up and down the country, we do consider that our Home fully justifies all the efforts made on its behalf.

In conclusion, may I say that we want more subscriptions in order to make the assured income balance more equally the normal expenditure, and we want special donations, so as to cover items of extraordinary outlay. Subscriptions and donations will be gratefully received by our treasurer, or by—

The secretary of the Workers' Aid Society asks leave to press its claims on the notice of those who are interested either in Winifred House, the Children's Nursing Home, or the London Missions to the poorer districts, and to remind existing members that their subscriptions are due at the end of November. The society asks from its members a contribution of two garments a year, and a sixpenny subscription for expenses of carriage, postage, &c., the residue of which is spent in the purchase of additional articles of clothing. The society has been in existence for thirteen years, and has, during that time, given much aid to the workers in the various agencies named. The secretary, Mrs. Goodwyn Barmby, Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth, will be happy to supply any information which may be desired.

LITERATURE.

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORY OF AMERICA.*

IT has been arranged that the Cambridge Modern History shall appear in a double series. Accordingly, the second volume to be published is the seventh, to be succeeded by Vols. II. and VIII., and so on, until the entire work in twelve volumes has been issued. Even more than the first volume on the Renaissance, this survey of American history fills a gap in our historical literature. For the ordinary reader, there has been Professor Goldwin Smith's brilliant sketch, and Fiske's lectures on the Beginnings of New England, not to mention the various monographs on the War of Independence and the Anti-Slavery Struggle; but for a broad survey of the whole field, combined with fulness and accuracy of detail, there has been nothing to compare with the volume before us. Any attempt at criticism of details would be out of place except in the pages of a journal devoted to the scientific study of history. We must be content with a passing reference to one or two points of special interest. There is something very opportune for the English reader at the present moment in a fresh study of the causes which produced the rupture between the Mother-country and the American colonies in the eighteenth century. They were partly fiscal, and partly the result of a failure to understand the temper and needs of a new country, impatient of control, and with a growing consciousness that it must develop both its resources and its policy in its own way. Historical parallels may easily be pressed too far. They are nearly as easy to juggle with as statistics. But, as Burke said, "history is a preceptor of prudence."

The two chapters on "The United States as a World-Power," by John B. Moore, Professor of International Law in the Columbia University, and "The Economic Development of the United States," by H. C. Emery, Professor of Political Economy at Yale, are also of special interest in view of present controversies. In the former, the two salient points are the beginnings of the war of tariffs and of a definite foreign policy. With remarkable prescience President Cleveland, in 1887, uttered a warning against the political influence of interested groups. There was, he contended, among those who were the chief beneficiaries of a system of tariffs "an organised combination all along the line to maintain their advantage," which was hostile to the best interests of the State. The possible disadvantage to our own political life from a similar course is a matter worthy of candid examination, quite apart from specifically economic arguments. Here, again, we think that there are directions in which American history may be a preceptor to English prudence. There are few chapters of recent political history more remarkable, and in some respects more startling, than the rapid growth of the United States into a world-power. After it had begun with the interference in Samoa in 1886, the subsequent policy of expansion in Cuba and the Philippines followed by an almost inevitable drift. Dominated by a fresh and unfamiliar idea, which gave a new direction to the whole national consciousness, the people were carried blindly forward. Professor Moore's analysis of the courses of this enthusiasm for expansion is full of interest :—

* The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. VII., The United States. (At the University Press. Pp. xxvi., 857. 16s. net.)

"The chief historical significance," he says, "of the Samoan incident lies less in the disposition ultimately made of the islands, than in the assertion by the United States, not merely of a willingness, but even of a right to take part in determining the fate of a remote and semi-barbarous people whose possessions lay far outside the traditional sphere of American political interests. The tendency thus exhibited, though to a certain extent novel, was by no means inexplicable. The intense absorption of the people of the United States in domestic affairs, which resulted from the Civil War and the struggle over Reconstruction had ceased. A last effort to extend political support to the negro, by means of a federal law for the control of national elections, was about to end in failure. The effort nowhere excited enthusiasm. The old issues were no longer interesting; the national energy and sense of power sought employment in other fields. The desire for a vigorous foreign policy, though it jarred with traditions, had spread and become popular. The reconstruction of the navy had also begun."

Professor Barrett Wendell's essay on the American intellect comes appropriately at the end of the volume. It is not the less interesting because it travels beyond the field of historical narrative into that of criticism and speculation, in the attempt to account for certain national characteristics, and to estimate the value of American achievement in letters, art, and science. We confess that there is, to our mind, something a little fanciful in the plea that the people of the United States are what they are, largely because they have retained "more traces of Elizabethan England than have survived in the Mother-country." We are also told that "the typical American of 1900 is on the whole more like his ancestor of 1775 than is the typical Englishman." The arguments by which these statements are supported do not strike us as very convincing, and too little weight is attached to the mixture of population, the influence of climate, and the inevitable reaction upon national characteristics of the attempt to transfer a distinct type of civilisation to a new soil, where it was divorced from its historical associations. Some of Professor Wendell's strictures do not err on the side of leniency. "Americans have observed well; they have made a great many useful and practical inventions; but to this day pure science would be little poorer without them." Similarly, the American intellect has shown little creative power either in music or art, though it is contended new and striking architectural effects are being produced which show "increasing dignity, beauty, and impressiveness." With some of his literary judgments, notably when he speaks of Walt Whitman as "a sporadic anarchist," we are not in entire sympathy; and we fear that many of his countrymen will find it hard to forgive a sentence like the following: "Their literary expression has tended, on the whole, to rather journalistically precise and vivid statements of something resembling fact."

In the brief account of American religion there is some quiet and effective criticism, as, for instance, when it is pointed out that "the Yankee Unitarians are disposed to be as logical in their inferences from the assumption that man is made in the image of God as their Calvinistic forefathers had been in their inferences from the dogma of total depravity." This we believe to be one of the besetting weaknesses of Unitarian theology in this country as well as in America. It relies far too much upon logical inference from first principles, which are assumed as axiomatic, like the love of God and the radical goodness of human nature, instead of proceeding by induction from facts of experience and history. In this characteristic it is often far closer than it would like to think possible to the intellectual methods of Jonathan Edwards and the other leaders of the Calvinistic school.

The feature of American life which appeals most strongly to Professor Wendell's patriotic enthusiasm is the devotion to education. The school and the public library in the New World are fast taking the place of the cathedral and the baronial hall in Europe. The extraordinary popular ardour for education sometimes assumes strange forms, for which—we confess it not with pride but with misgiving—we can offer no parallel. "A typical incident occurred at San Francisco during the summer of 1901, when the Philippine Islands had just come, for better or worse, under American control. At that moment hundreds of half-trained public school-teachers, men and women alike, crowded into the transports which were to carry them to Manila, with a spirit as devoted, and a belief in their calling as absolute, as that which animated the crusaders of Peter the Hermit." There may be something "superstitious" in this kind of enthusiasm. It may be lacking in intelligence, in imagination, and in spirituality. But a country which can inspire such devotion to the things of the mind has its face towards the rising sun.

MISS ANNA SWANWICK.

THE Memoir of Miss Anna Swanwick of which we recently published a review, is enriched by a number of portraits, two of the subject of the memoir, one of her mother, a familiar photograph of Dr. Martineau, and another of Crabbe Robinson. The most striking is that of Francis Newman, from a daguerreotype of 1851, the face clean-shaven and full of animation.

The volume furnishes many delightful glimpses of Miss Swanwick's friendships. There are several quotations from letters telling of her intercourse with Gladstone. Thus on one occasion she wrote :—

> Seating himself beside me, Mr. Gladstone proceeded, after a few preliminary remarks, to inquire whom, in the wide range of literature, I regarded as the greatest poets. I replied that, in my judgment, there were four poets of transcendant genius, Homer, Aeschylus, Dante, and Shakespeare. Then turning the conversation to Dante, he inquired which of the three parts of the "Divina Commedia," the "Inferno," the "Purgatorio," or the "Paradiso," I regarded as the highest effort of genius? I replied without hesitation "The Paradiso," upon which he remarked that he always judged by the answer to that question whether he was speaking to a true appreciator of Dante or not. He said that he regarded the reading of Dante not merely as a pleasure, but as a vigorous discipline of the heart, the intellect, the whole man. "He who labours for Dante," he added, "labours to serve Italy, Christianity, and the world."

Miss Swanwick was frequently the guest of the Tennysons, and tells how one evening, at his house in Eaton-square, she heard the poet give a reading of "Maud." The following reminiscence is of special interest :—

> On the occasion of my first visit to Aldworth he took me into his study, which commanded a magnificent prospect. While admiring the varied landscape the poet's thoughts seemed naturally to assume a religious attitude. I was deeply interested, on reading his biography, to find how, almost habitually, the great spiritual realities of the unseen world were present to his mind, Thus, in speaking of "The Holy Grail," he says, "I have expressed there my strong conviction of the reality of the Unseen." The three lines in Arthur's speech are spiritually the central lines of the Idylls :—
> In moments when he feels he cannot die,
> And knows himself no vision to himself,
> Nor the High God a vision . . . .
> On another occasion he thus expresses himself: "Yes, it is true that there are moments when the flesh is nothing to me; . . . . when God and the spiritual are the only real and true; . . . . you never, never can convince me that the 'I' is not an eternal reality, and that the spiritual is not the true and real part of me."

And Miss Swanwick adds an expression of thankfulness for the complete sympathy there was in religious matters, without reference to creed or dogma, between herself and Tennyson.

Of a visit to Dr. Martineau, in his Scottish home at Aviemore, in 1883, Miss Swanwick writes :—

> I have felt it to be a rare privilege to have tarried so many days under the roof of our "Prophet-Poet," as Dr. Martineau has been aptly styled; to have shared his admiration for the glorious scenery which surrounds his Highland home, and to have enjoyed many a quiet colloquy on topics of the deepest interest. To feel that the reverence with which I regarded him in my girlhood should have been transfigured into the beautiful and reverential friendship of later years, is indeed a happiness!

Browning and Dean Stanley, Lord Shaftesbury and Mark Pattison, Max Müller, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and Sir George Grey are also among those of whom interesting glimpses are found in these pages.

THE simplest forms of Nature are strangely animated by the sense of the Divine Presence; the trees and flowers seem all, in a sort, children of God. And all the common uses and palpably visible forms of things become subordinate in our minds to their inner glory—to the mysterious voices in which they talk to us abont God, and the thoughtful and typical aspects by which they witness to us of holy truth and fill us with obedient, joyful, and thankful emotions.

John Ruskin:

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

V.—THE LORD'S PRAYER.

Matthew vi. 9–13; vii. 7–11.

JESUS was anxious that the disciples should not think of prayer as an exercise, or act of duty. That was why he warned them against "much speaking," and "vain repetitions." He wanted them to speak to their heavenly Father as children speak to an earthly father whom they love, naturally and freely. If their hearts were full, the words would come: "Out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaketh." To show them how simple a thing prayer really is, and how much may be said in few words, he gives them a little form to help them, a form which ever since then has been called The Lord's Prayer.

The first form was even simpler and shorter than that which we have here, and was more like that which is found in Luke xi. 2–4. As time went on, more words were added, to make the meaning clearer, but the Prayer, as it was first spoken, was probably contained in these five short sentences:—

(1) Father, hallowed be Thy name.
(2) Thy kingdom come.
(3) Give us daily our bread for the coming day.
(4) Forgive us our sins.
(5) Bring us not into temptation.

These five sentences were not meant to tell the disciples exactly what to say; they were rather intended to be little notes, to show them what to pray for, and in what order to present their petitions. The fuller form, which we all know, is the form we shall study, and we will take it as it stands in the Revised Version.

Our Father which art in Heaven.

This is the invocation, the calling upon God to hear. The three words, Our, Father, Heaven, must be examined separately.

(1) OUR. "Our" is better than "my," for we are not praying only for ourselves; we are praying for all with whom we have to do, and also for the whole family of mankind.

(2) FATHER. The Jews were accustomed to think of God as Father, but rather as the Father of the nation, than as the Father of every member of the nation. Jesus would often say, "your Father" to the disciples, and so bring it home to them that the great Father of all was also, in a very close and tender way, the Father of each individual, separately.

(3) HEAVEN. Wherever God is, there is heaven, and in that sense heaven and earth are one, but we cannot help thinking of God as far above us, and raised above all that is false and wrong.

I.—Hallowed be Thy name.

To hallow is to treat as holy, and the Name of God is God Himself, as we are able to know and understand Him. We pray that in us, and everywhere, His revelation of Himself, His Truth, may be looked upon as very sacred.

II.—Thy kingdom come.

God does not only make Himself known. He reigns in the heart in "righteousness and peace and joy" (Romans xiv. 17). This is His Kingdom, and in this petition we pray that, knowing Him, we may also be possessed by Him, and become like Him in character.

III.—Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.

There is not only a truth to be known, and a character to be formed; there is also a will to be obeyed. We pray, therefore, that the will of God may be done, actively carried out, in us, and in all the earth. Each sentence, you see, is an advance upon the last, goes a little further in meaning, and the words "as in heaven, so on earth" are probably meant to be added to them all. There are other beings in creation higher than ourselves, who know God better, and are more like Him, and are more active in His service. We ask to be numbered with them as fellow-workers—"as in heaven, so on earth."

IV.—Give us this day our daily bread (or, our bread for the coming day).

This petition turns upon our bodily wants. We ask God to give us such things as may be necessary for bodily life. "This day, for the coming day" is a little strange, but very likely the double expression was thought to make the prayer suitable both for morning and evening use.

V.—And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors.

This supplication makes mention of our spiritual need. We never give God all that is due to Him, and every due unpaid becomes a debt. We therefore ask Him of His mercy to overlook our debts, and to loose us from them. To show that we are in earnest, and wish to be quite honest, we plead that we, on our side, have already forgiven our debtors—those who have fallen short in payment of that which is due to us. The importance of this is pointed out in verses 14, 15.

VI.—And bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one (or from evil).

Temptations are inducements to do wrong, but they are also tests and proofs of that which is right. There is good in them, but there is also danger; we must not be too much afraid of them, yet neither should we defy them. Jesus warned his disciples not to trust themselves too much: "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation"; they were to ask God not to bring them, or suffer them to be brought, into trials of their faith and love which might be too strong for them, and cause them to fall.

The second half of the sentence says very much the same thing in a different way; not to be brought into temptation is to be delivered from evil. What was exactly in the minds of those who added it, and whether the Greek words mean from the evil one, or from evil, we cannot certainly say. One way or the other, evil is a very terrible fact in the world, an offence to God, and a very deadly foe to man; well may we pray twice over to be delivered.

Looking back over the prayer, two or three things will strike you.

The first three petitions put the highest things first: the divine Name, the divine Kingdom, the divine Will; the last three make mention of human wants: want of food, want of pardon, want of grace. Again, in the first three we think only of God: "THY" is the note of each; in the last three we turn to thought of ourselves, and "us" is three times repeated.

In the seventh chapter Jesus goes back again to the subject of prayer, and tells the disciples that prayer is an asking, a knocking, a seeking, and is never in vain. Granting, or withholding, God still gives "good things," and, if we do no more than simply submit our wills to His will, we still receive, and find, and enter as through an opened door. E. P. B.

ISLINGTON POPULAR SERVICES.

SIR,—May I correct a mistake for which I am responsible in the advertisement of the popular services in your current issue? Mr. Hopps's subject there appeared as being the same as two he gave at Greenwich. This, however, is not so, as will be seen by reference to this week's advertisement.

Further, I should like to call attention to the singing practices on Tuesday and Saturday (November 3 and 7), at 8 o'clock, at Unity Schools. Canvassers will also be heartily welcome on either of these evenings.

For the Sunday afternoons, a band of canvassers has been organised, for whom tea will be provided at Unity Schools. Friends who can help in this way may communicate with Mr. Bertram Talbot, 86, Cromwell-avenue, Highgate.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.

UNITARIANS AND TEMPERANCE.

SIR,—The National Unitarian Temperance Association, desirous of awakening a slumbering interest in the Band of Hope and Temperance movement, is endeavouring to persuade all Unitarian ministers to preach special sermons on Temperance Sunday, November 29. To this end, I have sent out the enclosed circular letter to each minister on the Year Book list.

The letter, as you will observe, calls attention to facts which need some explanation. Are there only 13 adult temperance societies and 49 bands of hope in connection with our 364 places of worship? Are there only 64 of our ministers pledged on the side of temperance and opposed to the drink curse (as stated in Rev. C. Hargrove's speech on June 5 last)? Is it a fact that only 6,004 scholars and adult members of our Unitarian churches are enrolled on the books of temperance societies, while 35,995 is the total membership of the Sunday School Association?

Sir Wilfrid Lawson has told us that there is a trinity of opposition which temperance advocates have to meet—ignorance, appetite, interest. I for one will never believe that either of these exist in our Churches. There must be some other cause. You will see from my letter to Sunday-school teachers that I regard it to be "apathy."

The occasion of Temperance Sunday will provide an opportunity which should be seized, and trusting that you will throw open your columns on our behalf, and exert your influence in favour of the cause we plead,—Yours, &c.,

W. R. MARSHALL, Organising Secretary.

ALLHALLOW EVE.

NOVEMBER must come in every year, and bring with it a good deal that is dismal and dreary. But its first dawn brings the festival of All Saints, a day of glad remembrance, and of visions of blessed hope. Among the quickly recurring anniversaries few or none are better worth regarding than this. Other feasts have a tendency to come down in the world; the feast of All Saints, on the contrary, has, till now, only begun to take on the glory which will shine fuller about it as the ages go. Beautiful associations in plenty already cluster round it. Dreams of painter, poet, and prophet break ray-like through the gloom and grey of our daily life, bidding us lift our eyes. The pencil of FRA ANGELICO limns anew before us the pictures of mediæval piety, and with that gentle artist we seem to catch the music of another world. The rose of DANTE'S "Paradiso" now blooms afresh, radiant with the spirits of the blest. And the private prophetic heart of every man sees far off, so far, yet hovering as if willing to come near and nearer, beings who once were mortals but who now walk, for him, among the angels.

The multitude of the blest, most blest in that their blessing falls like sunshine upon this world of ours, expands as years pass and wisdom grows. Each eve of the feast invites us to look up to a wider and more inclusive heaven. The merely conventional in sainthood slips away like the dry husks of autumn fruit, and the living seed of the essential life, pure and true, shows itself. A more adequate conception, a truer sense, of what is becoming to souls consecrated to GOD, opens our eyes so that they are no more deceived by the sickliness and morbid moods too often associated with the name of saint, nor are altogether holden from discerning close beside us the excellent of the earth in whom is our delight. A clearer perception of the Divine ideal, so abundantly manifested in nature, of unity in variety, liberates us from the narrowing tendencies of a too imperfect sympathy. A new orthodoxy, not of the head, but of the heart, extends on every hand the realms celestial. It is an orthodoxy too gracious and sane to confine these realms to the uses of men and women who shrank from the full cup of human experience; manly men are there, and women not robbed of half their womanhood by being sundered from the love of husband and child. This new orthodoxy, already recognised by most people as the only rule applicable to heaven, will doubtless be found, by and by, meet for earth also. No one picturing the blessed ones above will place the particularist PETER there and pass by the universalist PAUL, will look for DOMINIC and forget FRANCIS, will mark the presence of CALVIN and have no eyes for SERVETUS. Or, to come to our own age—for it is in accord with the genius of the feast to realise not antique sainthood alone, but modern excellence as well—who, that have any dream of a world where the permanent in men finds due scope and perfecting employ, would limit to their heaven this class or that, one sect or type or another? If Father DAMIEN, the self-doomed Catholic leper, is there, is not Father TAYLOR also, the beloved Methodist missioner to sailors? Should Sister DORA walk there and not our own Santa FILOMENA, that "lady with the lamp" already canonised in LONGFELLOW'S verse? Will the porter at the gate accept KEBLE and decline CHANNING? Are "Little Sisters of the Poor" there and not "Hallelujah Lasses," an evangelical Lord SHAFTESBURY and not the heretical followers of GEORGE FOX; HANNAH MORE and not DOROTHEA DIX?

It was a saying of ERNEST RENAN'S that "fine surprises" doubtless await men when they die; surely one of them must be amazement that they did not draw closer together, soul to soul, in assured concord of feeling however different in method, while yet alive on earth. This world has its glooms and shadows, especially in November; but here comes the opening day of the month reminding us of the deeper unities that exist not in heaven alone but also on this earth, between sincere, truth-loving, beauty-loving people. "Except in opinion," said CARLYLE, of himself and JOHN STERLING, "Except in opinion, not disagreeing." When true lovers of men get together that is just their case, and the first step towards divine commonsense is to recognise it—the first taste of divine blessedness is to rejoice in it. Only as a temporary expedient let there be different "churches" any more; All Saints above are of one fellowship, may it not be so here below? It is surely coming, as surely as the fresh budding of sainthood in each generation of sinners.

For it is befitting, as a closing thought on the vigil of this feast, that we should remind ourselves how "nigh is grandeur to our dust." Of course, as regards our contemporaries, our tongues are tied by a usually wise reserve, but our thoughts may be bold. Of himself a man dare say nothing at all, for his two natures in one, his "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," have not yet fought it out quite. St. PAUL had good reason, we must suppose, to walk warily and humbly, lest after all he should prove nothing but "a castaway." But if there is a shadow-side to every saint, at least in this stage, there is also even now a light-side to every sinner. The lines we draw separating the bad from the good, grow fainter and fainter the more we understand men; the deceiving power of circumstance grows less, and a deeper insight discovers glories of human nature in people not often numbered with the saints. Heaven, we think, must be big to hold all the souls whose music is the gladness of the world. There is room enough, as FABER sings. And there is room enough in every life for something of the quality that makes a man a Saint of GOD.

THE ALTERNATIVE.

ONE of the most re-assuring elements in the present political situation is the consistency with which Liberal opponents of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S schemes are emphasising the need of, and their determination to further, an alternative policy of social amelioration at the heart of the Empire. "We do not put forward Free Trade," said Sir HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, at Bolton, "as being in itself a full remedy for the woes that afflict the State. Because we are satisfied with Free Trade, and with the increase in our collective wealth that has accompanied it, it must not be thought that we are not as determined as ever to deal with the impediments to the wholesome distribution of wealth." "Let no one suppose," said Mr. ASQUITH at Newcastle, "that the only alternative is to wrap ourselves in the inertia of a complacent optimism. We Liberals not only do not deny, we assert, not for the first but the hundredth time, that both in the industrial and social spheres there are evils which cry aloud for redress." And Lord ROSEBERY and Lord SPENCER have spoken to the same effect.

Free Trade has done much for our increased national welfare, but it has not done everything. It has increased the sum of our national wealth, and it has checked that tendency to the creation of extremes of wealth and poverty within our borders which is among the most fruitful sources of evil in the body politic. But these inequalities cannot be cured by Free Trade alone. Other reforms are needed. Our self-governing Colonies are hard at work on experimental legislation to secure them, and we at home should be far better employed in making use of the fruits of their experience in this direction than in copying their obstinate conservatism in the matter of tariffs. Here, in comradeship in this truly democratic mission of the equalisation of opportunities, is a far more enduring bond of sympathy, giving a very much higher significance to our Empire, than Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S ideal of a fiscal fight against the world.

The proposals put forward by the Liberal leaders for securing the better distribution of wealth within our borders are the reforms upon which progressive thought has been for years increasingly concentrating—land reform, education reform, and temperance reform. It is curious that in the widely read editorial article in the first number of the new Independent Review advocacy of reform along these three lines is prefaced by the assertion that official Liberalism is without a programme. As a matter of fact, it is some time since we have come across a better summary of the immediate reforms for which the Liberal party stands, and has stood for years, than this programme of the Independent editor. The INQUIRER is not a party organ, but it is surely matter for rejoicing to it and to all men that while the official chiefs of one great party in the State are seeking to guide their countrymen along a path which must inevitably lead to an accentuation of all the evils which our present extremes of wealth and poverty produce, the chiefs of another great party are renewing their pledges to find means of mitigating those evils on lines along which the mature thought of the best minds of the country are pointing with ever increasing conviction.

"Deal with the impediments to the wholesome distribution of wealth," says Sir HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN. "The State has a double duty," says the Independent Review; "it must aim on the one hand at distributing wealth, or the advantages of wealth, more evenly throughout the population, and, on the other hand, it must so influence the lives of the recipients as to fit them to enjoy their new privileges." The present uncontrolled monopoly of land is at once the prime obstacle to the more even distribution of the advantages of wealth, and the most potent factor in unfitting the population by over-crowding to enjoy such advantages as the increasing national wealth might bring them. The arrangement by which the control of the education of the people is placed in one set of hands, and the duty of finding the money to pay for it in another, and by which the chief influence in its development is given to people who are sectarians first and educationists afterward, handicaps the equipment of intelligent youth for making use of subsequent opportunities of betterment to its own and the national advantage. The comparatively free field given to those engaged in the dangerous sale of alcohol, for multiplying temptations to excessive self-indulgence in people who might otherwise successfully withstand them, constitutes a drag upon the material, intellectual, and moral progress of the nation and the individual which many have been accused of exaggerating though few have succeeded in doing so. Finally—and this is a point emphasised alike by the Liberal leaders and the Independent reviewer—the recent restrictions and impediments placed in the way of the workmen in their task of collective bargaining with those who seek to employ them, is a menace to the growing prosperity of organised labour which we cannot afford to allow to continue, despite undoubted instances of the occasional abuse of its power which may be quoted against the Trade Union movement. Full opportunities for developing their physical, mental, and moral aptitudes are the birthright of our people. Room to live, a decent education, the minimising of external temptations to wrongdoing and freedom by combination to secure the best market for their labour—these are the first essentials upon which all lovers of their kind should concentrate their endeavours at this time of the parting of the ways in the history of our Imperial realm.

CHRIST AND THE VIVISECTOR.

IN the Abolitionist of October 15 we find the following verses, a protest against the method of experimental science which involves the torture of dumb and helpless creatures :—

In a beautiful, dim cathedral,
The window I love the best
Holds a picture of Christ the Shepherd,
With the lamb he saved on his breast.
Though they talk of a "higher meaning,"
Of Redemption he came to bring,
Yet I love to think of him loving
The lamb—just the living thing.

To-day we have made a statue,
It is set in a public place,
As a tribute to one of genius
Who toiled for the good of his race.
And they tell us, to his dishonour,
How he learnt, to our shameful gain,
In a Hell for God's helpless creatures,
To bridge our pain with their pain.

There it stands, in the glad sweet sunshine,
Or under the clean grey rain—
A sculptured group—the man in his strength,
And the helpless beast in its pain.
Hard by is the great cathedral,
And the likeness there of the Christ,
Who cares for the meanest creature
That ever was sacrificed !

The statue stands to a nation's shame,
Where the children pass and play,
And the picttred Christ in the window
Turns His sorrowful face away.

CHURCH ORGANISATION.

ADDRESS BY MR. CARPENTER TO THE LAYMEN'S CLUB.

AN ordinary meeting of the Laymen's Club was held at the Inns of Court Hotel, Lincoln's Inn, on Thursday evening, October 22, when a considerable number of guests, including the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. John Harrison, Mr. Hahnemann Epps, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. Cogan Conway, Mr. Howard Young, Mr. G. W. Brown, and Mr. P. E. Vizard, were entertained at dinner. The formation of this club we recorded early in the present year, with its object "to promote social intercourse among men connected with the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches of London, and to further the interests of liberal religious thought." According to rule, there may be a hundred ordinary members, of whom not more than ten may be ministers. The President, Dr. Herbert Smith, who was in the chair on Thursday evening, announced that there were already 71 members of the Club (the quota of ministers being complete), and that there were already four more nominations for membership. Of the 27 London churches 17 were represented in the Club. The special object of that meeting was to hear an address from Mr. Carpenter on the "Advisability of a Permanent Representative Organisation of our Churches," after which other guests present were invited to give their opinions. A further special meeting of the Club is to be held next Wednesday, when the matter is to be discussed by the members.

THE ADDRESS.

At the beginning of his address Mr. Carpenter noted that the representative principle was accepted as the basis of self-government in modern England. It was so in civic life, in borough and county, in the House of Commons, and in education also, though less directly there than they desired. The same principle was applied in the churches with increasing thoroughness, and it appeared that it was the best organised churches which in recent years had made the most progress. The Presbyterian Church in England was a notable instance, while the Wesleyan Methodists had added to their "Legal Hundred" the Conference, which consisted of 240 clerical and 240 lay members, to give a wider representation, and the Church of England had established its House of Laymen, side by side with Convocation. When he was in America nine years ago, he was told that it was only the organised churches, such as the Presbyterian and the Episcopalian Methodist, which throve and made their way in the West; and throughout the world they saw how effective the Salvation Army with its admirable organisation had proved.

Weakness of Congregationalism.

In the Congregational type of church government, on the other hand, each individual church was regarded as complete in itself, with entire control of its own affairs, including the choice of minister; and in what he might call the High Congregationalism, maintained by such men as the late R. W. Dale, that form of church government was held to be divinely revealed in the New Testament, and the action of the church was regarded in a mystical way as the action of Christ himself. That was a view not held in their own churches; with them Congregationalism was a matter of convenience and of historical growth. They were free to adopt whatever system appeared the best. The liberty of the Congregational method had its drawbacks. It included the liberty of a congregation to go to sleep undisturbed, to allow the fabric to decay, to be slovenly in the management of affairs, so that there were treasurers who rendered no accounts, and trustees who could not be made to do their duty. Further, among such churches there was a loss of cohesion, a want of sympathy in common life, and responsibility for a common cause. What, he asked, did Lancashire know of East Anglia or Devon, or the West of England of the North? Of recent years there had been welcome signs of closer co-operation, as when London worked heartily for the great Manchester bazaar, and such help was cordially reciprocated in the later London bazaar. But still the dangers of apathy and indifference were serious; the weaker churches were neglected by the strong, the temptation to self-indulgence on the part of a wealthy self-contained church was great; they suffered loss of members and inward decline, because they did not throw themselves into self-forgetting work in the wider field without, and did not realise the significance of their common cause.

Partial Organisations.

Some organisation, it was true, there had long been among their churches, and since 1844, which was for them the middle of the last century and marked a new departure in their history, a number of local associations had been formed, which now practically covered the whole country except Cornwall, where they had no churches. Scotland and Ireland, with their separate methods and resources, he did not deal with on that occasion. Among the earliest in the field was the Southern Unitarian Association, founded in 1803, and the South Wales, and Northumberland and Durham Associations; after 1844 came the London District Unitarian Society, founded in 1850, the Manchester, Liverpool, Midland, and other District Associations. They had a great variety of names, sometimes only local, or with "Christian," "Unitarian," "Presbyterian," "Free Christian," in various conjunction. They aimed at the business organisation of the churches, and their membership was increasingly representative of the churches.

The question then arose, was it desirable to have any body that should bring the activities of those district associations into line, to harmonise, co-ordinate, and inspire them? So far as that had been done from the business point of view, it had hitherto been the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and it was impossible to exaggerate the value of the work of that Association during the past half-century. Without its aid it was difficult to imagine where many of their churches would have been. Particularly in the last thirty years the advance in aid given had been noteworthy. In 1872 the grants in aid of churches amounted to £716, but in 1902 the amount was £2,237, so that in thirty years it had been more than trebled. They could not be too grateful for what had been accomplished, with a great expenditure of patient labour, and for the experience that had been gained.

But then they were seriously warned, from quarters which they could not disregard, that this method of aid violated the true basis of their church organisation, and that undogmatic churches ought not to receive grants from a doctrinal association. The origin of this objection was to be found in the history of their churches. In the last century two distinct currents were to be seen running through Unitarianism. There was the doctrinal Unitarianism inherited through many transformations from such men as Priestley, Lindsey, and Belsham, who, in the 18th century, had left their churches, in revolt from the old dogmas; and there was another current derived from a totally different source, in their old chapels, which through the freedom inherited from their founders, whether old English Presbyterians or Independents, had passed from their original orthodoxy to Unitarianism.

The Dissenters' Chapels Act.

Early in the last century orthodox Dissenters urged that those who held Unitarian beliefs had no right to their old chapels, and an attack was made on some of the old foundations. The Lady Hewley suit, decided in 1842 against the Unitarian trustees, rendered Unitarians insecure in the tenure of all their old chapels, of which some 178 had been of orthodox foundation. But to dispossess the congregations of what they had inherited in an unbroken continuity of religious life for generations, where there was no distinct doctrinal limitation in the trust, would have been manifestly unjust, and therefore in 1844 the Dissenters' Chapels Act was passed, with the concurrence of the leaders on both sides, including Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, Gladstone, and Macaulay, to secure the title of the congregations to their old chapels.

But the special point to be noted was that when this question arose, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which was organised on the basis of Unitarian theology, could not step in to defend the possession of undogmatic chapels. This was clearly seen by the Rev. Robert Aspland, the founder and ardent supporter of the Unitarian Association, and he himself proposed and established another Union, the "English Presbyterian Union," for the purpose of defence in the matter of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. It was a golden opportunity, which unhappily was thrown away, for as soon as the special end was secured in the passing of the Bill the Union was dissolved, and the organisation of the churches remained in the hands of the doctrinal association which had been seen to be inadequate to their defence.

Dr. Martineau's Position.

For a time there was no trouble, but in 1859 Dr. Martineau published his letters on the "Unitarian Position" and "Church Life or Sect Life," in which he confessed how the Lady Hewley case had opened his eyes to the dangers of a dogmatic basis for churches, and in 1867, at his instance, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which he remained a member to the end of his life, dropped what small element of church representation it had, and became definitely an association of individual subscribers alone. So strongly did he feel on that point, that after helping to found the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern counties, he withdrew from membership when its committee undertook to pass on grants from the Unitarian Association to some of its constituent churches.

The National Conference.

How far that feeling was shared by others he did not know; but when they came to deal with the permanent organisation of their churches, it would have to be taken into account. They were warned against the danger of ecclesiastical control in organisation, but he did not think that, with their traditions, they need fear undue influence, and certainly they suffered grievous loss for want of common life. There was poverty of imagination to realise the greatness of their cause, and their calling to a common work. The formation of the National Conference in 1882 had been a gain; it had brought a quickening of life, which might carry them forward to greater things. At the last Liverpool Conference proposals to that end had been made. In Mr. Wood's paper, which he hoped they all would carefully consider, it was pointed out that only a third of their churches were self-supporting; two-thirds received external help, which involved some measure of control, and so far invaded the principle of Congregational independence. Might not that principle be extended, so as to draw the churches more closely together? Mr. Wood proposed a Joint Maintenance Board to harmonise the distribution of aid to the churches. It seemed that various funds administered an income of £3,994, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the local Associations together made grants amounting to £4,416, a total of £8,410. It was worth while to inquire whether there might not be some means of drawing the various trusts and associations into one representative body for the business organisation of their churches.

Further suggestions had been made, of which he himself was responsible for one. He wanted to show the friends of the Conference that if they wished that body to administer aid to the churches they must find the means. Those who were anxious that the principle for which Dr. Martineau so strenuously pleaded should be adopted as the basis for the business organisation of their churches must point out a way for raising the necessary funds. They could not ask the Unitarian Association to hand over £2,000 of its income for that purpose. But if they wished it, the thing could be done. A strong and vigorous church could not be built up without labour, thought, and money, and, he would add, the constant prayerful endeavour of their hearts.

The Church of the Future.

In conclusion, Mr. Carpenter said :—

"In the ancient Book it is promised that a day shall come when the young men shall see visions, and the old men shall dream dreams. No special blessing is announced for the middle-aged. Nevertheless, I,too, have my hopes of the possibilities of the future. Sometimes I think I see signs arising of a new church in the coming days, when we shall no longer be troubled about names, whether Unitarian or even Christian, a church built deep and wide on the foundations of human experience, in which the testimony of all souls will be welcomed, to which all workers for righteousness and truth will minister ; a church strong in wisdom to harmonise the best knowledge with the finest religious instincts, strong in purpose to build up noble lives, animated by endeavours after whatsoever things are pure and lovely, honourable and of good report ; a church quickened by a deep human love, a love that will be able to gather into its fellowship all the weary and worn, the feeble and despondent, ay, even the degraded, the lustful, the base ; a church with a word of healing and help for every human ill, a word of consecration for every human energy. I shall not live to see that church, but only to know that it is there. It is being built already in a thousand activities, of which we are unconscious in the vast and multiform life around us. I can only pray that when that church manifests itself, as it will, in vast uprisings of human thought and aspiration, our little community may be ready to take its place within it, willing to lose itself in the great cause of the progress of mankind."

THE DISCUSSION.

At the conclusion of Mr. Carpenter's address the PRESIDENT expressed the great indebtedness of the Club to him, and invited the opinions of other guests.

Mr. COGAN CONWAY said that they were all Unitarians, and he had difficulty in imagining who it was who declined to receive help from the Unitarian Association. What they needed in their churches, which were Unitarian Churches, was more association, more union, but not more organisation, for that would mean ruling and tyranny.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., recalled the zeal of the early Unitarians, and said they were all Unitarians now, but did not think of shutting the door on any growth in the future. He thought they had all the machinery that was needed, what they wanted was steam to work it.

Mr. W. WALLACE BRUCE said that the question seemed to be through what channel help should come to the churches ; and, with many others, he found great difficulty in understanding where the difficulty lay.

Mr. W. ARTHUR SHARPE, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said he was engaged in the practical administration of things as they are, and any work that Club might do in the way of organising a freer expression of opinion in the churches would meet with no opposition from the Association.

A very cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter brought the proceedings to a close.

COUNCIL MEETING

OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ON Tuesday afternoon the Council met at Essex Hall, the President, Mr. W. A. SHARPE, in the chair. There were also present :—

Rev. F. Allen, Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Mr. H. Blessley, Miss Burkitt, Mr. George Callow, Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Hahnemann Epps, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. J. Ellis Mace, Mr. David Martineau, Rev. R. J. Orr, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Rev. H. W. Perris, Mr. F. Pinnock, Rev. W. C. Pope, Miss Preston, Mr. J. T. Preston, Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mrs. Rutt, Miss Emily Sharpe, Mr. H. Stannus, Rev. J. E. Stronge, Mr. J. Sudbery, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Miss Tayler, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Miss Teschemacher, Mr. A. Titford, Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., Rev. W. Wooding, Mr. T. Pallister Young, and the secretary (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

The minutes of the meeting held April 28, 1903, having been read and confirmed, Mr. D. MARTINEAU rose to remind the Council that that occasion was the first upon which they could publicly welcome their President into his new office. They all knew the excellent stock of which he sprang, and his own high personal qualities assured them that the affairs of the Association would be well.managed under his direction. He begged to be allowed in the name of the Council to offer him their congratulations and sincere welcome.

The PRESIDENT cordially acknowledged the words just spoken, and the applause with which they were received. He had been met wth repeated expressions of cordiality and support, and he could only trust to deserve in some degree the confidence his friends had reposed in him.

The SECRETARY then reported the election of the Council, and its constitution as presented in the printed report of the annual meeting of the Association. He had also to refer to two matters that arose out of resolutions passed at the Council's previous meeting. The first concerned the recommendation of occasional grants to congregations in the absence of settled ministers. Such grants were already within the rules and practice of the Committee, and the Council's feeling on the matter would be duly kept in mind. The second had to do with the list of ministers in the Year Book. The extended information with respect to education, previous settlements, &c., of ministers was now being sought, and would be incorporated in the new issue of the Year Book.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

The following report on the work of the Committee was then read and submitted by the SECRETARY :—

1.—Sub-Committees and Chairmen.

In recent years the work of the Association has grown to such an extent that were it not that several sub-committees devote many hours to the sifting and detailed consideration of the matters which come before the Association, it would be impossible for the Executive Committee at its monthly meetings to deal adequately with such a large accumulation of business. The agenda for the last meeting, held in October, contained no less than eighty-nine items, not a few of these involving considerable correspondence. The following sub-committees with their respective chairmen have been appointed until the date of the next annual meeting : Finance, Mr. C. F. Pearson ; work in Scotland, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold ; publications, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee ; home mission work, Rev. W. G. Tarrant ; foreign mission work, Rev. James Harwood ; meetings and general purposes, Mr. Ion Pritchard. These sub-committees meet the week before the Executive Committee, and it is important that communications respecting grants and other business should reach the secretary in time to be placed before the sub-committees for consideration. It is hardly necessary to add that the recommendations of the sub-committees are submitted to the Executive Committee for approval, amendment, or rejection.

2.—Finance.

On December 31, 1902, there was a balance in hand of £19 6s. 3d. During the nine months ending September 30, 1903, the treasurer received £6,069, made up as follows : subscriptions, donations, and collections, £4,230 ; dividends and interest, £796 ; publications (sales and grants), £992 ; miscellaneous receipts, £51. During the same period the expenditure amounted to £3,875, made up as follows : grants for home and foreign mission work, £2,077 ; publication department, £816 ; salaries of office and book-room staff, £611 ; miscellaneous expenditure, including rent, &c., £371. The greater part of the large balance of £2,213 is pledged for work already planned out in connection with the new and enlarged operations of the Associations. It is due to the subscribers who placed such generous confidence in the administrative capacity of the Committee that the augmented income should be expended only after careful deliberation, in accordance with the scheme submitted to them, the details of which naturally require some time to work out.

3.—Publications.

The publication department of the Association has received a great impetus through the larger resources placed at the disposal of the Committee. Arrangements are in progress for the preparation of a new series of handbooks dealing with theology, the Bible, and practical religion, by competent writers, to be issued in an attractive form, with good paper, type, and binding. The first of the series, "Converging Lines of Religious Thought," by Dr. S. H. Mellone, has just been published. Volumes on the Bible and Modern Criticism, by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, the Doctrine of the Incarnation, by Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Natural Religion, by Rev. W. J. Jupp, are in course of preparation. Dr. Warschauer has written a useful handbook on "The Problems of the Fourth Gospel," issued this week. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's address at Amsterdam, on "The Place of Christianity in the Religions of the World," along with other essays on Comparative Religion, is in the press, and will be published shortly. Three discourses by Dr. Ames, the highly esteemed minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston, U.S.A., on the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, and Salvation by Character, have been issued in a little volume, as well as in the form of tracts. Rev. W. J. Jupp's suggestive and helpful address on "The Forgiveness of Sin, and the Law of Reconciliation," has also been published. "Chart and Voyage," an essay dealing with the dangers of theological reserve, by Mr. T. J. Hardy, is being circulated in large numbers throughout the country. The Essex Hall lecture on Emerson, by Mr. Augustine Birrell, has been published in a neat and attractive from, an excellent portrait of Emerson having been added. An edition of the Divinity School address, with a portrait, an interesting introduction, and a poem by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, was published in celebration of the centenary of Emerson's birthday. Several of the new series of "Home Pages," edited by Miss Helen Brooke-Herford, have already been issued. They are intended for working men and women, and consist of brief, simple, helpful presentations of religion, non-controversial, but based on Unitarian principles. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong's presidential address on "Freedom and Unitarianism" has been printed for circulation among the members of our congregations. Quite a number of Unitarian leaflets and tracts for the times have been reprinted for the use of postal missions, and for general circulation. The demand for literature explanatory of Unitarianism is wide-spread; applications now come from almost every corner of the habitable world. The Committee have received recently a large number of applications for books from "orthodox" ministers desirous of becoming better acquainted with Unitarianism on its theological as well as its religious side. Wherever there seems good reason for believing that the books will be read and studied grants are made.

There are wide and enlarging opportunities for the spread of liberal religious thought by means of the printed page, and the Committee trust that they may have the active co-operation of ministers and congregations in making use of the many excellent publications by English and American Unitarian writers, now procurable at the Essex Hall book rooms.

4.—Home Missionary Work

In view of the increased funds placed at the disposal of the Committee, arrangements have been made for extending the Home Mission work in several directions. A course of six lectures, addressed to educated and thoughtful people, will be delivered by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter at Nottingham, Richmond, and Lewisham, on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience." Mr. Carpenter will also give four Sunday evening lectures at Cambridge on "The Gospels and how to Read them." The Committee are confident that this attempt to reach the students and townspeople of Cambridge will meet with the warm approval of the Council. The Rev. Charles Hargrove will deliver lectures on "The Fourth Gospel," at Scarborough, and on the "Books of the New Testament," at Brighton. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong has in preparation a course of lectures on Theism and Agnosticism, which he hopes to have ready for delivery in the autumn of 1904.

People's Religious Services in public halls or theatres, intended for the unchurched masses in large centres of population, have been organised at Greenwich, Islington, Manchester, and Devonport; the Rev. John Page Hopps, the Rev. James C. Street, and others having undertaken to preach. The District Societies throughout the country have been invited to co-operate with the Association in organising these services for the people.

The ordinary grants to congregations in need of assistance are made once a year, but special grants are voted as occasion requires. Since the last meeting of the Council, the following grants have been made in aid of the enlargement or repairs of buildings, special lectures and services, and other purposes:—Aberdare (Highland Place), £12 10s.; Bradford (Manchester), £50; Colwyn Bay, £15; Colyton, £10; Crediton, £50; Crewe, £10; Deal, £7 10s.; Downpatrick, £10; Eastern Union, £30; Flagg, £5; Gateshead, £5; Halstead, £5; Liverpool District Association, £100; Newry, £20; Redhill, £5; Selby, £10; Sheffield (Upperthorpe), £15; Staple Hill (Clifton), £15; Yarmouth, £5.

The Rev. James Harwood has very generously placed his services at the disposal of the Committee, for the visitation more particularly of the grant-aided churches; and the Revs. Dendy Agate, Rudolf Davis, H. Enfield Dowson, Charles Roper, Frank Walters, and other ministers have promised occasional help in visiting congregations, preaching, lecturing, and conferring with them, when invited, about their work. The Committee are persuaded that the inspiring and helpful influence exerted by the visits of able and experienced ministers to the smaller and more isolated congregations is sure to do good. Applications coming from congregations will receive careful consideration, and efforts will be made, as far as practicable, to meet their wishes.

5.—The McQuaker Fund.

There is little of fresh interest to report in connection with the Unitarian Churches in Scotland aided by the McQuaker Fund. The congregation at Aberdeen are still looking out for a purchaser of their present building before proceeding to erect a new church on the site now in their possession. The congregation at Kirkcaldy are still without a minister, and the task of finding a suitable one does not seem to be easy. The committee of the Scottish Unitarian Association, aided by grants from the McQuaker Fund, have arranged for courses of propagandist lectures by the Scotch ministers. Dr. and Mrs. Crooker visited Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and preached in both cities, where their services were highly appreciated. The McQuaker trustees have arranged for the circulation throughout Scotland of a number of Unitarian books and pamphlets. At the present time, the older orthodox theology is being renounced by increasing numbers of ministers in the Established and the United Free Churches of Scotland, and the circulation of Unitarian literature is probably one of the most effectual ways of promoting the objects of the McQuaker Trust.

6.—Foreign Work.

The Council will be interested to learn that there are now studying at Manchester College, Oxford, three foreign students, one from Hungary, another from India, and a third from Japan. Mr. John Gyorgy, Mr. Vadudev Anant Subktankar, and Mr. Tadasu Yoshimoto, are the names of the students towards whose support substantial grants have been voted. The foreign work of the Association is growing in many directions. A selection of Unitarian essays and pamphlets was forwarded to correspondents in Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Norway and Sweden, and Switzerland, inviting them to select such as in their opinion would, if translated, prove helpful to inquiring minds in their respective countries. Interesting and valuable replies have been received, and steps are being taken to carry out several of the recommendations made by them. In response to an application from Mr. Jochumsson, a grant has been made towards the cost of printing passages from the writings of Unitarians in Icelandic. It was a pleasure to the Committee to send 1,000 crowns towards the cost of erecting a building at Fuzes-gyarmath, in Hungary, where a congregation of upwards of 200 people belonging to the farming class had seceded from the Lutheran Church and opened a Unitarian church which promises before long to become self-supporting. In India, the joint committee representing the various branches of the Brahmo Somaj have been invited to submit a scheme of special lectures on liberal religious thought and life, to be delivered in important centres of population by some of their able and experienced speakers. Towards the expenses of a satisfactory scheme the sum of £100 has been promised. At Allahabad, Professor Chatterjee has established a postal mission. He recently forwarded to Essex Hall lists containing the names of 300 university graduates in the North-West Provinces of India who had applied for Unitarian books and pamphlets. Several tracts had been translated into Urdu for circulation among educated Mohammedans. Unitarian tracts have also been translated into Arabic and published in a paper circulating among Mohammedans living in Jerusalem and other parts of Palestine.

It is already known to the Council that it was hoped that the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, after completing his year of office as President of the Association, would visit Australasia to preach and lecture in the chief towns of Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania. Unfortunately, the state of his health prevented him, much to his regret, from accepting the invitation of the Committee. Happily, the Rev. Charles Hargrove has promised to undertake this very important mission on behalf of the Association. The congregation at Mill Hill Chapel have generously granted him leave of absence from his pulpit for seven months next year. Mr. Hargrove will leave England for Australia at Easter, 1904. He will carry with him, the Committee are sure, the fraternal greetings of the Council to the Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers and workers of Australasia.

7.—International Meetings at Amsterdam

The President, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, the Past President, Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, Rev. James Harwood, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, and the Secretary attended the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers at Amsterdam as the official representatives of the Association. The meetings were a great success in every way, and the utmost courtesy and kindness were shown not only to the official delegates, but to the large party from Great Britain and Ireland, numbering nearly two hundred, who attended the meetings of the International Council. The opinion of Professor Pfleiderer, the eminent theologian of Germany, who took part in the proceedings, may be here quoted:—"The keynote in all the addresses was thoughtful sobriety in judging the present and a joyful and confident hopefulness in regard to the future. One was conscious of serving a cause that for the moment is represented merely by an insignificant minority, with no prospect for a long time to come of any position of public influence, but to which after all the future belongs."

The next meeting of the International Council will be held in Switzerland, probably at Geneva, the city where to-day (October 27) a monument erected to commemorate the martyrdom of Servetus will be unveiled, on a site chosen as near as possible to the spot where 350 years ago he was burnt.

8.—Autumnal Meetings, Manchester.

The governing body of the Manchester District Association invited the Association to hold the autumnal meetings this year in Manchester, and it was a great pleasure to accept this invitation. The arrangements for the meetings are as follows:—Tuesday, November 10. Religious service in Cross-street Chapel at 3.30 p.m., when the Rev. Frank Walters will preach the sermon. At 5 p.m., there will be tea in the Lower Mosley-street schools. At 7 p.m., there will be a public meeting in the Free Trade Hall, when the Rev. S. A. Steinthal will occupy the chair, and the speakers will include the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, John Page Hopps, James C. Street, and W. Copeland Bowie. Wednesday, November 11. The proceedings will begin with a brief devotional service at 10 a.m., in the Lower Mosley-street schools, conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper. From 10.30 to 1, there will be a conference, when papers followed by discussion will be read by the Rev. R. D. Roberts on "The Propagation of our Unitarian Faith," and by the Rev. Charles Peach, on "City Churches and the Theory of Independency." In the afternoon, 2.30 to 5 p.m., papers will be read by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin and Mr. J. Wigley on the "Strengthening of our Congregational Life," and by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas on "A Church of the Present." In the evening, at 7.30 p.m., there will be a conversazione in the Midland Hall. Thursday, November 12. The Sunday School Association will hold a session, when Miss Marian Pritchard, the president, will occupy the chair, and papers followed by discussion will be read on "The Responsibilities of Church and School towards each other," by Mr. Richard Robinson and Mrs. Manning. The Committee trust that the members of the Council will do what they can to promote the success of the Manchester meetings, so that an inspiring and helpful influence may flow from them into the life of the churches and schools of the district.

9.—Association Sunday, November 15.

The Committee are most grateful to the members of the 216 congregations who in 1902 collected the sum of £613 in aid of the funds of the Association. This was the largest number of congregations and the largest amount collected since the establishment of Association Sunday in 1883. The work is growing both and at home abroad, and an earnest appeal is again made to Unitarians generously to support their national and international working missionary organisation. If for any reason the appointed day, November 15, is inconvenient to any congregation, another day can be selected.

10.—Deceased Members of the Council.

It is with deep regret that the Committee report the death of two members of the Council since the last meeting. Mrs. Alfred Lawrence was for many years most regular in her attendance at Unitarian gatherings; and she took the keenest interest in the affairs of the denomination. The warmth of heart displayed in her intercourse with many of our ministers was a conspicuous characteristic; and her kindly presence will be sorely missed by a large circle. The Rev. C. H. Well-beloved bore an honoured name in our Unitarian fellowship, and his own quiet and faithful ministry has left behind a sweet and ennobling influence on the thought and life of those to whom he ministered. The Rev. T. B. Broadrick was not a member of the Council, but he laboured faithfully in the position of district minister in the West of England, as the joint representative of the Western Union and of the Association, and his death has caused a vacancy which it will not be easy to fill. To the relatives of the departed, the Committee would convey, through the Council, their respectful sympathy in the bereavement that has overtaken them.

QUESTIONS ON REPORT: THE COMMITTEE'S RESPONSIBILITY.

Mr. TITFORD having asked respecting a grant for work at Redhill, was informed that it referred to a course of lectures delivered there under the direction of the S.E. Provincial Assembly.

Miss E. SHARPE asked how far the McQuaker trustees considered themselves responsible for what went on at the churches aided by their grants. She particularly referred to the case of Kirkcaldy, where a minister, the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, had settled for a few months but had since left, and who gave as explanation the statement that he found them, "one and all, agnostics." The same minister had, apparently, got on very well with the congregation at Dundee, where he had given temporary service. Her point was whether the Association took no notice of what was done in such cases, but made its grants all the same.

MR. I. PRITCHARD, on behalf of the Committee, said he knew Kirkcaldy very well, and its former minister. Of course, the Committee sought satisfaction as to the worth and efficiency of a minister, but they could not undertake to be responsible for the opinions of the congregation. They had heard only one side of the matter as represented by the recent minister. The Rev. Ernest Parry had been there five years previously, and had received the hearty support of the people, whom he himself knew as reliable, thoughtful, and earnest.

Mr. H. STANNUS considered it was a grave state of affairs if, as reported, these people were agnostics. He presumed the trust deed defined the building as intended for the worship of God, and it was surely the duty of the trustees to see that the trust was duly carried out.

The SECRETARY deprecated the discussion. It was, he said, no kindness to the gentleman named to go into this question. He had evidently not understood the people, but, no doubt, by further experience he would learn much. They, as an Association, did not "apply tests" either to ministers or congregations. On being satisfied that a worthy minister was selected by the congregation they had made a grant in aid of his stipend, and under similar circumstances the grant would be renewed.

The PRESIDENT, in summing up the discussion, said the Committee were responsible for the payment of the grants they made, but not for the administration of the trusts of particular churches. The facts, whatever they were, would be duly considered on the occasion of any application for a further grant, but it must be clearly understood that they were not responsible for the administration of chapel trusts, and had no responsibility for the religious opinions of the people at Kirkcaldy. He would now proceed to move the reception of the report, and in doing so he particularly wished to refer to the meetings at Amsterdam, which he, in common with many of those present, had the pleasure of attending. He felt in complete accord with the sentiments expressed by Prof. Pfleiderer in the words embodied in the Report. They went as Unitarians, but they were sensible of being there in the midst of a larger church than the Unitarian Church, though it involved nothing that clashed with their faith and principles. They were in touch with the whole movement of freer religious thought, and recognised their solidarity with all free churches in the world. He was sure that all who were present at those meetings would wish to renew the experience by going to Geneva for the next great gathering of the kind. A message of thanks had already been sent to Holland for the very kind reception they had met with.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER, in seconding the report, wondered whether sufficient attention had been drawn to the Association's willingness to aid the weaker congregations. The real need now was not so much of money as of effective men, and he sometimes doubted whether we had amongst us the proper machinery for producing such preachers.

The SECRETARY explained the means taken to inform district societies and congregations as to the nature and extent of new help the Association was prepared to give; he regretted that there was not always shown that alacrity in response which they would desire.

Mr. G. CALLOW reported very favourably of the popular services now being held in the Carlton Theatre, Greenwich. Audiences of four to five hundred of earnest and attentive people had come together, and if preportionate success was met with at the Grand Theatre, Islington, next month, they might be assured that the outlay had been fully recompensed.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the report, said its publication would, no doubt, greatly extend the knowledge not only of what the Committee had done but what it was hoping to do throughout the country.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

MACEDONIA.

Mr. H. BLESSLEY having asked, as a "matter of emergency," whether a vote might not be taken on the subject of the horrors in Macedonia, the PRESIDENT read the portion of the rule applying, and on his part agreed that the subject should be introduced if that course were supported by two-thirds of those present. On appeal to the Council the requisite support was given.

Mr. BLESSLEY then moved his resolution. He said the responsibility of our nation was evident as one of the signatories of the Berlin treaty, and yet the most hideous outrages had been carried on with apparently no check. The case of the Macedonian people was most pitiable, and as of old there was a cry, "Come and help us." He considered it was a sad page on our history that recorded these things; and how could they remmeber the international brotherhood of the Amsterdam meetings and not protest with all their heart against the continuance of these horrors? Other religious bodies had already spoken their minds on the subject, and surely no form of religion had a closer or more vital connection with politics and international righteousness than Unitarianism!

Mr. E. CHATFEILD CLARKE, who seconded, referred to the non-party character of the great meeting at St. James's Hall, and hoped that they would feel this to be a matter uniting them all, whatever their special political sympathies might be.

The resolution, after some modifications and additions, was put and carried unanimously in the following form:—

We, as loyal citizens of the United Kingdom, remembering that our country was one of the principal signatory Powers at the Berlin Congress twenty-five years ago, and that, therefore, we are largely responsible for the long continued misrule of Turkey in the Balkan States, would urgently call upon His Majesty's Government to take such effective steps as they may think fit in order to put a stop to the Macedonian massacres, in accordance with the terms of the Berlin Treaty; we also desire to place on record and convey to Mis Majesty's Government our conviction that the direct rule of the Sultan in Macedonia and the neighbouring provinces should, as soon as possible, come to an end.

This concluded the business of the Council.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Bedfield.—The Rev. F. Summers, of London, in conjunction with the minister, the Rev. R. Newell, has been conducting a week's religious mission in Bedfield and the neighbouring villages of Monk Soham and Woolingworth. Every cottage in the district was visited, and a personal invitation was given to attend the special services. Unitarian tracts were also freely distributed. The results have been highly encouraging. There were large attendances at the Bedfield Chapel on week-nights and Sundays, and the agricultural labourers and their wives and children also joined with real pleasure in the simple hearty services held in cottage rooms in Monk Soham and Woolingworth. The anniversary sermons were preached at Bedfield on October 25, by Mr. Summers and Mr. Newell. On the following Monday the annual tea and public meeting took place. The building was well filled. Mr. T. Barker, of Kenton, took the chair. Mr. Newell stated that the attendances during the year both at Sunday-school and services had been good, and now that the labourers had got through the pressure of the harvest he hoped they would make full use of the club and reading-room; in addition to which he proposed to inaugurate "Pleasant Thursday Evenings," with lantern lectures and music, as well as carry on the teachers' Bible-class and choir practice. Mr. Barker, Mr. Summers, Miss Tagart, and Miss Florence Hill also spoke.

Blackpool: North Shore.—On Wednesday, the 14th inst., a course of three week-night lectures on "Evolution and Religion" was began by the Rev. Herbert V. Mills. There were many strangers present. The weather was very wild and wet, but the audience numbered about 110 persons, and included the Rev. D. Davies, who presided; the Revs. Thos. Leyland and Peter Dean, of Loughborough, who also gave short addresses.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The annual meeting of the members of this church took place on Oct. 22, and the reports of the various sections of the church and school work showed very satisfactory progress. The event of the year has been the congregation's removal from a hired room into a hall of its own, the first services in the new building being held on July 19, when the Rev. J. Page Hopps was the preacher.

Burnley.—On Monday, Oct. 12, the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal, began a course of week-night lectures in the Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church on "Evolution and Religion." In spite of a heavy downpour of rain which continued all day, there were about 200 persons present. On the occasion of the second lecture, on the 19th inst., there was a larger attendance.

Chorley.—On Tuesday, Oct. 13, this old chapel was quite filled, when a course of week-evening lectures was commenced by the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal.

Crewe.—A public tea and reunion meeting, previous to the re-opening of the Free Christian Church, Beech-street, Crewe, which has been closed for about sixteen months, took place on Wednesday evening, Oct. 21. The distinct success of the gathering was most encouraging to the representatives of the East Cheshire Christian Union who were present, and the large attendance augured well for the prosperity of the cause. Tea was provided at half-past six for about eighty persons. At the reunion meeting which followed Alderman J. Briggs presided, and he was supported on the platform by the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A. (Ashton-under-Lyne), Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A. (Denton), Rev. A. C. Fox, B.A. (Glossop), Rev. E. A. Maley (Nantwich), Rev. G. H. Smith (Congleton), and the Rev. B. C. Constable (secretary to the Union). Mr. Constable said that on June 17 the Liverpool District Missionary Association passed a resolution instructing their Secretary to communicate with the committee of the East Cheshire Christian Union with a view to including Crewe in its operations, and on July 15 the Union decided to do so for twelve months on the terms offered. It was ascertained that the members of the Crewe Church were strongly in favour of the premises being re-opened, and all the persons who were interviewed on the subject promised their support. Subsequently the church and school were renovated, and it was decided that they should be re-opened at once. Earnest speeches followed on the work of the new church from the chairman and the visiting ministers, after which the officers and committee for the year were elected. The re-opening services were commenced on Sunday evening last, when the first was conducted by the Rev. C. Harvey-Cook, the minister-elect of Warrington, who took for his subject, "What we affirm." Nearly one hundred persons were present, which was considered an exceedingly good beginning. The following ministers are advertised to conduct the services on the next six Sunday evenings, viz., Revs. W. Harrison, Dendy Agate, B.A., H. D. Roberts, R. T. Herford, B.A., W. J. Jupp, and H. Rawlings, M.A.

Framlingham.—Very successful anniversary services were held at the Old Meeting House on Oct. 25 the Rev. F. Summers, of London, was the preacher. The tea and public meeting took place the following Tuesday, Miss Tagart (President of the Postal Mission) presiding. A hopeful tone pervaded the meeting. Mr. Newell, who is now in charge of this chapel, as well as that of Bedfield, stated that the services had been better attended lately, and several good week-evening meetings had been held.

Liverpool (Ullet-road) (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., of Bury, has accepted a very cordial invitation to become minister of Ullet-road Chapel, Liverpool, in succession to the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc., and will leave Bury at the end of the present year.

London: Forest Gate.—The Upton-lane Literary and Social Union has successfully inaugurated its season. At its third meeting on Oct. 22 the first of a series of "National Types" was the subject, and Michael Angelo's manifold genius was illustrated from many sources. Two thousand copies of the new paper, Unity, are being distributed in the district, a page of local matter being given. The ladies are busy with preparations for a sale of work in early December.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-School Union.—The annual meeting was held at Denton on Saturday week. At the committee meeting immediately after tea, the retiring president, the Rev. H. S. Tayler, M.A., in the chair, among other business the question of week-night services was considered, but as the reports from the various schools were not favourable, the matter was held in abeyance for the present. At the annual meeting the new president, Mr. Wm. Lawton, took the chair. About 120 teachers and friends were present. The report and financial statement were read and adopted, and the officers elected as follows:—Vice-president, Mrs. Dowson; musical representative, Miss Brooks; treasurer, Mr. F. Hepworth, Oldham; hon. secretary, Mr. A. Slater, Hyde. A vote of sympathy on account of his illness and of thanks for past services was accorded to Mr. Ashworth, who had acted as treasurer for the past eleven years. Mrs. Rawlings, wife of the newly-settled minister at Denton, read a most interesting paper entitled, "Some of my Sunday-school Experiences." During the evening Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., urged the claims of the East Cheshire Union Bazaar upon the schools of the Union, and several interesting speeches followed. The Denton friends contributed musical selections, and the Singing Class gave part songs. Hearty votes of thanks were given and responded to, and the Evening Hymn and Benediction closed a very successful meeting.

Pendleton.—A bazaar was held in the schoolroom adjoining the Cross-lane Church on Oct. 22, 23, and 24, to raise a sum of £500 to pay off the deficit on the church account, to ensure the payment, during the next three years, of a salary sufficient to secure the services of a capable minister, and to reduce the mortgage of £320 on the church property. The bazaar was opened on Thursday by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. Alderman Rawson, who presided, described the growth of the church, remarking that forty-five years ago it had its commencement with a series of mission services. They had an exceedingly creditable record, for they had bought the land upon which the present building stood at a cost of £1,500, the erection of the building had cost £2,500, and they had added a lecture hall and a Sunday-school, which had cost £1,400, making a total of £5,400. He thought that constituted a record which gave them a strong claim upon the liberal support of all who were favourable to their cause. Sir John T. Brunner, in declaring the bazaar open, urged the importance of Sunday-school work. Other speakers included Mr. J. Wigley, chairman of the church committee, and the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A. The bazaar was opened on Friday by Mr. Percy H. Leigh, and on Saturday by Mr. Henry Philips Greg. The total amount realised from the three days' sales and subscriptions was £402 towards the £500 required. The effort will be continued until the £500 is raised.

Sydney (New South Wales).—Five years ago (says the Sydney Evening News of Sept. 17, just to hand) the Rev. George Walters, after a pastorate of ten years, resigned the pulpit of the Hyde Park Unitarian Church, and formed a congregation upon the lines of the Rev. Dr. Strong's Australian Church. He was followed by the great bulk of the members and adherents, and services have been held in the I.O.O.F. Temple, Elizabeth-street, City, where large evening congregations have been the rule, and occasionally the building has been filled with nearly a thousand persons. Circumstances have apparently made it desirable that there should be a reunion of the two societies, and on Wednesday night, at a special general meeting of the Australian Church members, it was unanimously resolved to amalgamate with the members of the Unitarian congregation. The united services will commence, under the ministry of the Rev. George Walters, on the first Sunday of October, when he will explain why he is still a Unitarian. It is hoped that, with the amalgamation of liberal churches, the prospects of the broader faith in Sydney will be brighter and more assured.

Taunton.—A tea and social gathering of a very pleasant character were held at Mary-street Unitarian Chapel, Taunton, on Oct. 22, to welcome the newly appointed minister, the Rev. Frederick A. Homer, late of West Bromwich. About one hundred friends sat down to an excellent meal, which was laid at six o'clock. Mr. Edward Goodland presided at the subsequent meeting, and among others present were the Rev. F. A. and Mrs. Homer, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Cullompton, and formerly minister at Taunton; and the Rev. E. Parry and Mrs. Parry, of Ilminster. The chairman said they were met together to offer a very hearty and kindly welcome to their new minister and his wife. Though they had been with them only about two months, he thought he would be only right in saying that they settled in their new home as soon as they entered it. They felt very thankful to the good fairy who wafted Mr. Homer across from Canada in the nick of time and persuaded him to take up his ministry in the West of England, and he hoped his ministry among them would be long, happy, and successful. In welcoming visitors from neighbouring towns, the chairman said he should like to see Taunton, Bridgwater, and Ilminster more closely linked together in loyal support and real work and help, and he hoped that Mr. Parry and Mr. Homer might initiate some plan to help to bring about that result. Speeches of welcome were also made by Mr. George Philpott, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington (a former minister at Mary-street), and the Rev. E. Parry. Mr. Homer, in replying, said it had been a pleasure to him to learn of their complete organisation, and that they did not leave the minister to do everything. It would be his constant hope and endeavour to maintain the present level, and even, if possible, to raise it. He thanked the speakers for the kind words which they had used in reference to his wife and himself, and expressed the hope that they would be there for many years, and that the kindly feelings existing between them and the congregation would grow stronger and stronger.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to resume his morning ministry at Little Portland-street Chapel to-morrow (Sunday), and is to preach regularly on Sunday mornings until further notice. Service begins at 11.15. and after 11.10 no seat-holder's place can be reserved. "It is to be hoped," says the chapel Calendar, "that the congregation will be large, that the hon. treasurer (Miss Tagart) will meet with a hearty response to her appeal for a generous financial support of the services, and that the result may be a real stimulus to liberal religious life and work in the metropolis. Such a stimulus was never more needed than to-day, when the success of organised religious efforts appears to be so moderate, and the area of weariness and indifference so vast. Our earnest desire is that those who receive refreshment, solace, and inspiration from the preacher's words shall show their gratitude in the most practical and Christian way, viz., by transmitting to others the message of truth and hope, and by helping the struggling men and women who, in difficult days, are upholding the banner of a liberal faith."

THE monument erected to Servetus at Geneva was unveiled on Sunday, and not on the previous Tuesday, the actual 350th anniversary of his death, as had been originally arranged. The monument, which is a fine block of granite, bears on two of its faces the inscriptions which we printed in the INQUIRER of July 25, stating that this "expiatory" monument is erected by "reverent and grateful sons of Calvin," who thus publicly condemn that act, "steadfastly adhering to liberty of conscience according to the true principles of the Reformation and of the Gospel."

ON Sunday afternoon the monument was first formally presented to the Council of the parish of Plainpalais, in which it stands, and at a subsequent meeting, addresses were given by the Rev. E. Choisy, chairman of the Monument Committee, Professor Chantre and Professor Doumergue, of Montauban. The first speaker recalled the facts of the life of Servetus, his contributions to science, and the last lurid scene of his life and death. Professor Chantre told of the protests made at the time against the execution, and Professor Doumergue in an eloquent discourse justified the erection of that expiatory monument and dwelt upon its great significance. As members of the Protestant Reformed Church, they now made their protest, and Geneva had the honour of being the first to raise such a monument, thus solemnly and publicly condemning religious intolerance.

THE Porte has replied "unfavourably" with regard to some of the points in the revised scheme of Macedonian reforms presented to it by Russia and Austria, and has "laid stress on its sincerity in the application of the measures of reform decreed in February last." It is easy to guess which points it is that the Porte takes exception to. The reforms of last February suited it admirably, for the simple reason that they left their execution in the hands of the Turk, who proceeded cheerfully to undo with one hand what he performed with the other. The new scheme provides for the appointment of two European "assessors" by Russia and Austria to assist the Mussulman Governor in carrying out the reforms, thus providing that close external supervision essential to the success of any scheme for the better government of Ottoman subjects.

LORD LANSDOWNE proposed six weeks ago to Counts Lamsdorf and Goluchowski two alternative schemes in amendment of their reforms of February, one of which was this plan of European "assessors" and the other the far simpler and more effective expedient of the appointment of a European governor responsible to the Powers. Naturally the Chancellors chose the less drastic expedient, but that they should amend their scheme at our suggestion at all is sufficient reply to those who would have us sit idly by because we are powerless to influence the action of the two Emperors. Is it too much to hope that, the Porte proving recalcitrant over the lesser scheme, the Emperors may yet be brought by the pressure of England, France and Italy, whose peoples are in undoubted sympathy in the matter, to advance their demand to Lord Lansdowne's alternative, and to exercise the coercion which even they must begin to see is inevitable in favour of a really effective remedy?

LAST Saturday, the Archbishop of Canterbury addressed a letter to Dr. Horton, in which he attempted to minimise the differences between "reasonable Nonconformists" and "reasonable Churchmen," and suggested a conference in the hope of removing existing causes of offence and misunderstanding. But to secure such a conference on the question of denominational religious teaching in elementary schools, it is clear that the Archbishop must very materially alter his statement of the "certain large and leading principles" which are to form the common ground on which discussion shall be based.

IF the first of these leading principles, as set forth in his letter, stood alone, those who reject what is known as Evangelical Christianity might feel themselves in some danger of being faced by an exceedingly powerful combination—far more powerful than the present alliance of Anglican and Roman Catholics—for imposing the religious beliefs of a section of the community upon the schools of the nation, and at the national cost. "We agree," Dr. Davison thinks, "in earnestly desiring that the elements of the Christian faith, as taught in Holy Scripture, should form part of the regular instruction given in elementary schools," subject to a conscience clause. We are not, we think, doing the Archbishop an injustice in assuming that in his mouth these "elements" include, at least, the cardinal doctrines which distinguish "orthodox" Christianity, whether Roman Catholic, Anglican, or "Evangelical Free Church" from the rest of the world. Under the old School Board system, as was pointed out at the recent Provincial Assembly Meeting at Highgate, such an alliance was in virtual existence in very many school board areas, when Bible Teaching meant Evangelical teaching and nothing else.

BUT the Archbishop himself obviates, for the moment, the danger of such an alliance by his statement of the further leading principles upon which the proposed conference is to be based. "We agree further, I think," he says, "in maintaining that those to whom is entrusted the privilege (usually so highly valued) of giving this teaching, should be persons qualified to give it genuinely as well as efficiently." Here, again, it is only too certain that in some places agreement on religious tests has existed among Evangelical Christians under the School Board regime to the prejudice of ideal liberty. But Dr. Davidson is too obviously thinking of the teachers of Church doctrines in rate supported schools for this "leading principle" of his to have any attraction for Nonconformists of whatever school.

IT is, however, his final principle which places the Archbishop's conference most in jeopardy. "Yet further, I believe us to agree," he says, "that, in the present state of English feeling on the subject, it would not be right to banish wholly from our elementary school system the giving of denominational religious teaching within school hours, under proper restrictions, to those children whose parents desire it;" and he proposes as one of the points to be discussed, the question whether denominational teaching ought to be "allowed under proper safeguards in all elementary schools in which the parents of children desire it."

IT comes therefore to this, that Dr. Davidson invites "reasonable Nonconformists" to confer with "reasonable Churchmen" as to whether Anglican doctrine shall be taught at the public expense, not only in schools, the buildings of which he wrongly supposes to be "gratuitously supplied" by the Church, but also in the schools wholly built at the public cost—whether, further, the Church shall be allowed the right to decide what State teachers are qualified, and what State teachers disqualified by their religious beliefs to give instruction in the State schools. The reply from any Nonconformist leader at all in touch with Nonconformist opinion in the matter can, of course, only be a very emphatic refusal to have anything to do with such a conference.

THE sweeping changes in the political complexion of the Metropolitan Borough Councils produced by last Monday's elections are of course due to many causes. But far the most important, probably, is the determination of Nonconformity to secure that, so far as its provisions will allow, the new Education Act shall be administered in the interests of education, and not of a sect. We do not suppose that the example of some Welsh County Councils in refusing the support required by the Act to schools not under adequate popular control will be followed in London, though there is much that may logically be said in defence of such a proceeding. But short of this a great deal can be done by both the local and the central London authorities in the exercise of a pressure not contemplated by the authors of the Act to secure the execution of the popular will in all schools supported out of the popular purse. It will probably require very little experience of the new régime to convince all concerned, of whatever party, of the urgent necessity of a radical revision of the whole structure of the Act if London education is not to be reduced to a state of hopeless chaos.

OWING to the short supply of cotton, trade has been very bad in the Manchester district, and, though there are hopes of improvement, large numbers of workers are on short time, and many are unemployed. An inquiry in Ancoats last February revealed that in 1,000 homes no less than 170 wage-earners were out of work, and the number has increased since then. Many of the more thrifty households have drawn on their accumulated savings, and are near the end of their resources. It is probable that the Manchester City Council will establish a Labour Bureau, which, under their auspices, may be able to bring together employers and workers more effectually than the several voluntary associations, such as the University Settlement and the mission at the Central Hall, which have done what they could in this direction. But it is certain that there will be much distress this winter among industrious folks as well as others.

ALTHOUGH a committee specially appointed to investigate the "sleeping-out" problem in Manchester reported in favour of action which was referred to in a recent number of the INQUIRER, the City Council has rejected their recommendation, and it seems probable that the evil will be greater this year than last. There is need to enlarge the resources of Domestic Missions, the Police Aided Society for Clothing Destitute Children (which at its annual meeting last week recorded a good work) and all organisations which are prepared to meet distress with sympathy and discrimination.

DELIGHTFUL things were said and done at the opening of the Victoria Hall, for mission work in Deptford, by the Wesleyans the other day. Lively speeches were made, beautiful hymns were sung, big collections were taken, good stories were told, admirable resolutions were formed, the doxology was sung on the announcement that in solid material affairs a good beginning has been made, for that the building might now be regarded as free of debt. But other things seem to have been said not so delightful. One sentiment attributed to the preacher for the day, Dr. Campbell Morgan, was of a kind that has often repelled an earnest young thinker from Christianity: "If there are any men that are not lost, then neither Christ nor the Church has any message to them." And, "When we forget that all men are lost, we effectually cut the nerve of Christian service." A more helpful announcement would surely be that "if there are any men who know the way and have never been lost, let them have some pity on their less fortunate brethren." And, inasmuch as the number of the safe, even now, is greater than that of the missing (Jesus imagined them as ninety-nine to one), it ought to be quite possible by unity and goodwill to restore and bless the wandering. On the following exposition attributed to the same preacher no comment is necessary: "That the Shepherd (in Luke xv.) represented the Son; the Woman the Church enlightened by the Holy Spirit; and the Father the first Person in the Blessed Trinity. Thus the chapter presented the whole Deity at work with the Church, seeking and saving the lost. We must suffer with the Son, and search with the Spirit, before we could sing with the Father."

MR. J. BREDALL, Hon. Sec. of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, sends us an appeal for help in temperance work. The Association was formed ten years ago, with the view of stimulating temperance life and work among our churches; it assists in the establishment of bands of hope and temperance societies, provides speakers and lecturers, lends lantern-slides, diagrams, libraries, &c., and in various ways endeavours to promote the inculcation of temperance principles, especially among the young. Mr. Bredall asks for more loyal support in this urgent work and for ampler funds that its extension may not be hindered. Donations or subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S., 8, Iffley-road, Hammersmith, or Mr. J. Bredall, 3, Birdhurst-road, Croydon.

PROFESSOR THEODOR MOMMSEN, the great Roman historian, who died at Charlottenburg on Sunday, nearly eighty-six years of age, was a native of Schleswig, but of German race. He was not only an eminent scholar but a keen politician, whose liberalism brought him into conflict with Bismarck. His first professorship was of civil law at Leipzic, where he was appointed in 1848. It was in 1858 that he became professor in the University of Berlin, and he was for some years a member of the Prussian Chamber. It is pleasant now to remember Mommsen's last message to the English people, published in the October Independent Review, pleading for closer sympathy and co-operation between his people and our own.

POEMS that open like a splendid flower,
Or break in beauty like a sudden star,
Over some antique, battlemented tower,
Where love-lutes mingle with broad seas afar;
Wood-paths that wind among bluebells and larches,
White roads beneath quaint avenues of limes,
Going across stone bridges, through whose arches
Flow liquid syllables and haunting rhymes;
And all the Nymphs and Graces linked in dance,
Naked from Greece, or having garments olden,
With patterns woven out of brave romance,
Green as the spring, and as the summer golden;
Bringing to our dull earth a little while Love, immortality, and heaven's smile.

SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

WORK IN THE PARISH.

II.

WHEN Dr. Chalmers organised his great social experiment of making a poor Glasgow parish independent of external charities, his first care was to ensure that every family in the parish should have a known friend to whom they could turn in times of stress. He was not to be an almsgiver; that, it was Chalmers' belief, would be fatal to his truer usefulness. Should external pecuniary aid prove absolutely necessary, then he was to report to the "deacons' meeting"; and it was part of his duty to ensure that no such case of absolute need was overlooked. But primarily, his work was to prevent such need for pecuniary help arising; to improve the resources of the families under his care, to teach a wiser economy, to encourage mutual helpfulness amongst relations, friends, and neighbours. And so great was the success of his method that with a population of over 10,000 of the very poorest in Glasgow, £66 6s. per annum was found sufficient to meet all their needs, and that sum was itself contributed by the working men and women who attended his evening services.

It would be difficult to find to-day a parish so poor and neglected as this parish of St. John's, in Glasgow, was when Chalmers came to it. But the faithful work which brought success then will bring success now in preventing destitution and beggary if tried in the same spirit of faith in the ultimate goodness and strength of the human nature we have to deal with. Let us suppose our parish divided out, and so many families entrusted to each visitor; how would the work now proceed?

In the first place, it would be the duty of each visitor to make himself (or herself) thoroughly acquainted with the families for whom he is to be responsible. No mere doorstep acquaintance is sufficient for this. He must be able to make himself a welcome friend, and have the art of winning the confidence which will be so necessary to his work. We must confess frankly that we do not all possess this art; that some of us are tongue-tied and embarrassed in the presence of strangers; we dread (and rightly) that we should become in our visitations like Mrs. Pardiggle in "Bleak House." If this is so, and if we find we cannot take a genuine interest in the people, it is better to turn to some other branch of work. There is enough and to spare for people of all dispositions and faculties.

But the visitor who finds that he can easily make friends, will find himself also in a position of great advantage when the time of trouble comes upon one or another of his families. Very likely he knows already the weak place, and will know the proper remedy to advise. In any case he has so far won the confidence of the family that it will be far easier for him than it would be for any stranger to find out the secret source of troubles. The "inquiries" which might waken resentment coming from a stranger, are from him the natural expression of his sympathy and interest. No doubt it is also true that his very friendship with the people may blind him to some extent; but Chalmers had a remedy for that, as we shall see later on.

When the time of trouble has come; when, to use the quaint old phrase, the visitor has "ascertained a destitution," let us see how he shall apply the four remedies. In the first place, he is, if possible, "to stimulate the industry of the applicant, and see what more he might earn." Or, to put it more widely, to see whether the family earnings cannot be increased. It must be remembered that even working people are not free from the temptations of laziness; and one of my greatest surprises when I began my work was to find how many families were poor because the man would not get up in time, or would always get "tired of the job" before he had been at work many days together. It is no easy matter to "stimulate the industry" of a sluggard, but it will be a good test of the visitor's powers. Less difficult, but hardly less important, will it be, to see whether there is not some boy or girl in the family who has left school and is running wild for want of someone to find them a place. Or, again, the young people might be doing better work and earning more money. One hesitates to suggest that perhaps the wife might earn, unless the children are past needing her care; but there will be room here for the visitor to exercise his judgment.

In the second place, he must try to "improve the economy" of the family. He may, for instance, check the expenditure which is sheer waste, as in drink or gambling. Both of these vices may be difficult to detect, for there is much waste in drink, short of that which produces drunkenness; but while they continue any attempt to assist will be futile. Or again he—perhaps here it may be preferably she—may endeavour to improve the economy of the housewife, teaching her to buy nourishing food, and showing her how to cook it, and, if possible, inducing her to become a member of a good co-operative society. Could not mothers' meetings be partly utilised for giving some helpful advice about the art of housekeeping and rearing children? They would then be doing their share towards the solution of a really national problem.

Or, again, the visitor may endeavour to improve the economy of the family by enabling it to perform the difficult feat of equalising an irregular income. The work of the collecting savings banks is so well known, and has proved so unfailingly successful, that I need say no more of it here than to urge its importance as enabling even the poorest wage-earners to make some preparation against bad times.

If both these endeavours fail, or prove inapplicable, there still remains what is, perhaps, most potent of all—the appeal to friends and relations. This is, perhaps, most appropriate in the case of the old or young; but it may well be practised also in times of sudden misfortune or sickness. Many of us hardly know what a rich stream of mutual helpfulness and benevolence flows between the poorer members of the community, just because this stream dries up at once with the advent of the external almsgiver. Chalmers' instance of the lady from the Female Society who, by giving a widow 5s., closed up far more effectual and more permanent sources of relief from her friends and neighbours, is typical. But the visitor can often use his leisure and influence to make known the needs which might otherwise be overlooked. The letter to the distant son or daughter, the visit to the employer, the communication with the comparatively well-to-do relations, will often open up permanent sources of assistance. And as an item of personal experience which may be reassuring to those entering upon the work, I should like to add how very seldom such intercessions meet with anything like a rebuff. Sometimes a refusal (which may be justified), sometimes silence; generally a cordial appreciation of the motives prompting our intervention and a ready response up to the limits of the donor's ability, is the result which amply rewards any trouble we may have taken. Whether it is a weekly allowance for the old people, a home for the orphan, or help to supplement the club money during times of sickness, it is seldom that in a well managed parish it will not be forthcoming without an appeal to strangers or to the Poor Law.

But when all natural sources have been fairly tried and failed, then it is time for the visitor to make his appeal to the committee which has been instituted for that purpose; and in my next paper I will consider some of the forms of help which such a committee may employ. Those who would like to know more of Chalmers and his work, will find an excellent account of it in a book by Mr. Masterman, called "Chalmers on Charity," and published by Messrs. Constable. I will quote, in conclusion, some words of advice given by him to a new deacon:—"If drunkenness be a habit with the applicants, this is in itself an evidence of means, and the most firm discouragement should be put upon every application in these circumstances. Many applications will end in your refusal of them in the first instance, because, till they have experience of your vigilance, the most undeserving are very apt to obtrude themselves; but even with them show goodwill, maintain calmness, take every way of promoting the interest of their families, and gain, if possible, their confidence and regard by your friendly advice and the cordial interest that you take in all that belongs to them."

LITERATURE.

MORLEY'S GLADSTONE.*

[SECOND NOTICE.]

MR. GLADSTONE AND RELIGION.

MR. MORLEY, warning himself against "the sin of violating the sanctuary," has opened the pages of Mr. Gladstone's private diaries to the world, and has revealed some of the secret thoughts set there during seventy years.

Respecting the keeping of such records there are two opinions, and an exact appreciation of what is written in them is difficult. The human heart is a strange thing and liable to self-deception, even in matters most sacred. To write anything is to allow if not to challenge perusal by another, and the barest contemplation of such a perusal must to some extent affect, if not the genuineness of the feelings recorded, at least the manner of their expression.

In Mr. Gladstone's case no re-assurance is required. The tone of the diary accords with the deep note of his public utterances on those occasions, which were numerous, when public affairs or personal testimony permitted the fuller opening of his mind. The vigorous personality of the man, his glowing and imperious nature, all the world knew; and now it knows, what otherwise it could have safely surmised, that all that abounding energy habitually surrendered itself in lowly submission to the Divine will. Here are his self-communings, prayers, and vows—a glimpse at least is given of the secret of the great man. Phillips Brooks used to say the greater the man the greater the secret—yet what can be simpler than this? It is the story not of one but of multitudes who have drawn strength from the Well of Life. He trusted and was helped.

All this, happily, might be said whatever view be taken of Mr. Gladstone's particular theology. It is the main thing, after all; and if we do not dwell upon it at the same length as upon subsidiary things, we shall not be misunderstood. The sympathy of all that is sincere in us goes out spontaneously toward the sincerity of kindred souls, and needs no words or few. But theology is a different matter, being substantially a question of expression. In the theological world we must needs speak as we are moved, and trust to time—or eternity—to provide an interpreter who will show how our dialects are related to each other and to the ultimate truth. Well for us if we share the large and generous temper of this great religious statesman.

He was nurtured in the Evangelical faith, as the two Newmans were. All three travelled far from the creed of their early years, and who shall say to which of them the greatest prizes of truth fell, to the cardinal, the theist, or the liberal high Anglican? Among his friends at college was that Joseph Anstice who, dying in 1836 at the early age of twenty-eight, left to the world not only one imperishable hymn of tender piety—("O Lord, how happy should we be If we could cast our care on Thee")—but also memories and influences such as young Gladstone thus records:—

> Conversation of an hour and a half with Anstice on practical religion, particularly as regards our own situation. I bless and praise God for his presence here. . . . Long talk with Anstice; would I were more worthy to be his companion. . . . Conversation with Austice; he talked much with Saunders on the motive of actions, contending for the love of God, not selfishness even in its most refined form. (i. pp. 56, 57.)

In the midst of his university work the conviction settled upon him that he ought to become a clergyman. The spectacle of "the moral wilderness of the world" appealed to him. Mr. Morley says:—

> The missionary impulse, the yearning for some apostolic destination, the glow of self-devotion to a supreme external will, is a well-known element in the youth of ardent natures of either sex. In a thousand forms, sometimes for good, sometimes for evil, such a mood has played its part in history. In this case, as in many another, the impulse in its first shape did not endure, but in essence it never faded. (i. 82.)

It was when visiting Italy in 1832 that Mr. Gladstone's mind was "suddenly arrested by the new idea of a church, interweaving with the whole of human life a pervading and equalised spirit of religion." The words are Mr. Morley's. They indicate a momentous change, and Mr. Gladstone himself was fully sensible of the difference between the old ideal and the new. It is, in fact, the difference between the prophetic and the priestly—to use a convenient but somewhat prejudicial phrase. In some respects we may regret such a change, but in others it was clearly an improvement. He tells a story of his former distress of mind at the marriage of one of his brothers with a young lady who had been brought up as a Unitarian, "yet under a mother very sincerely religious." He was put to it to find a way of satisfaction that all would be well—evidently a hard task for one brought up an Evangelical. By degrees, while he was able to hope that his mind had dropped "nothing affirmative"—his dogmatic creed, indeed, was early fixed—he could add:—

> I hope also that there has been dropped from it all the damnatory part of the opinions taught by the Evangelical school; not only as regards the Roman Catholic religion, but also as to heretics and heathens; Nonconformists and Presbyterians I think that I always let off pretty easily. (i. p. 162.)

It must be left to each of us to reconcile as best we can his theories and his practice. Those of us who can boast no shadow of claim for our church beyond its proved utility find it difficult to realise the combination of so strong an attachment to ecclesiastical authority and authoritative dogma as Mr. Gladstone preserved, with the genial temper indicated in these words. Certainly both the attachment and the mood were sincere in Mr. Gladstone's case.

Everyone remembers (though Mr. Morley makes little of them) the long and arduous debates in which he engaged by way, it would almost appear, of gigantic recreation, now against this, now that, form of heresy. Was there ever so ready a champion of lost Biblical causes? He accepted the tradition, and staked a good deal of reputation on its validity. What he called "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture" was, to many of us, the least defensible of citadels. His heroism here was all of a piece with that which stood up against all comers for the individuality of Homer. Half-way in his career he was so clearly wedded to "authority" that his biographer is fain to confess:—

> His mind still had greater faith in things because Aristotle or Augustine said them, than because they were true. (i. p. 201.)

And it really seems to us that the pressure of "authority" must have been heavy upon him when up to his later years he felt moved to stand as champion for some of these things.

His devotion to the Established system in the great Christian communions was life-long. It showed itself not only in punctilious observance of worship in his own Church, but also in the keen and prolonged interest he exhibited in affairs Roman and Eastern. As we observe his lengthy and minute correspondence on current ecclesiastical affairs, and especially his profound emotion at a crisis like that of the Vatican Council of 1870, we can hardly repress an idle wonder whether he might not have made as potent a prelate as a politician. The query is, indeed, idle; for where is the prelate whose life-motive is one of progress from mistrust of liberty to absolute devotion to it?

That this was the keynote of Mr. Gladstone's political career cannot be doubted. Within the limits accepted by himself in matters of culture and observance it is equally true of his religious development. He found, as every sensible man must, sooner or later, that the ideal of liberty expands the more it is followed. Its principles cannot be confined to political and civil life. While still "the hope of the stern and unbending Tories," he saw clearly where justice lay in the case of the heretical persons called Unitarians, whose rights he helped to defend in the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Act. Long after, when all the forces of alarm, prejudice, bigotry, and ignorance combined to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of his seat in the House of Commons, he spoke the wiser word, none the less forcibly because it came from the lips of a believer. Attached as he was to the Established Church, it was he who swept away the anomaly of the Anglican Church in Ireland, and Nonconformists found in him a true friend in spite of the prepossessions which naturally held him from surrendering all they would have.

If all this strikes us as singular in one who tried to be faithful to that great ideal of the Church which dawned upon him in 1832 at Rome and Naples, we must remember that even so great an ideal was ultimately not the highest that came to him. If ever it was right to say he believed upon authority, it would not be right to suppose that at any time he gave up his own responsibility to anyone else, however august. These are his own words in 1865:—

> I have never by any conscious act yielded my allegiance to any person or party in matters of religion; . . . the atmosphere of religious controversy and contradiction is as odious as the atmosphere of mental freedom is precious to me. . . . If another chooses to call himself, or to call me, a member of this or that party, I am not to complain. But I respectfully claim the right not to call myself so, and on this claim I have, I believe, acted throughout my life, without a single exception; and I feel that were I to waive it, I should at once put in hazard that allegiance to Truth, which is at once the supreme duty and the supreme joy of life. (iii. 542.)

* "The Life of William Ewart Gladstone." By John Morley. In three volumes. Macmillan and Co. £2 2s. net.

The principle here avowed is assuredly none the less admirable, and its avowal none the less welcome, when we remember who the speaker is. Had it been Channing or Martineau we should accept it as a matter of course; but, as if to guard us from the sin of believing ourselves to be righteous and despising others not so "free," we have this standing reminder that one may be a good Churchman and yet cherish liberty in religion. If we allow ourselves to feel anything like surprise at this, let it be rather with the thought that being so jealous of his own mental freedom, "there was never," as Mr. Morley says, "the shadow of mistake about his own fervent faith." Mr. Gladstone did not boast his mental freedom in order to draw off attention from the poverty of the results of that freedom. He simply ranged himself here along with candid minds, whatever their beliefs.

It is a pregnant observation that Mr. Morley drops by the way in the very interesting Boswellian notes (would there were more of them!) of conversations held with Mr. Gladstone toward the close:—

> Perhaps it may be mentioned here that, though we always talked freely and abundantly together upon ecclesiastical affairs and persons, we never once exchanged a word upon theology or religious creed, either at Biarritz or anywhere else. (iii. p. 471.)

One feels sure it would have been otherwise if the devout and ardent young student at Oxford, who thrilled under the impact of Anstice's pious mind, had then met one of Morley's stamp. But long experience teaches much, not alone of the virtues of a gentle tolerance but also of the supreme value of right conduct, whatever special philosophy may promote and support it. Mr. Morley's own remarks, appended to extracts from letters written by Mr. Gladstone to Mr. Darbyshire (ii. 137), are specially apposite on the first point:—

> To not a few the decisive change in Mr. Gladstone's mental history is the change from "the very narrow creed" of his youth to the "high Christian doctrine" of his after life. [The words quoted are Mr. Gladstone's.] Still more will regard as the real transition the attainment of this "comforting persuasion," this last word of benignity and tolerance. Here we are on the foundations; tolerance is far more than the abandonment of civil usurpations over conscience. It is a lesson often needed quite as much in the hearts of a minority as of a majority. Tolerance means reverence for all the possibilities of truth: it means acknowledgment that she dwells in diverse mansions, and wears vesture of many colours, and speaks in strange tongues; it means frank respect for freedom of indwelling conscience against mechanic forms, official conventions, social force; it means the charity that is greater than even faith and hope. Marked is the day for a man when he can truly say, as Mr. Gladstone here said: "Long, long, have I cast those weeds behind me."

As to the second point, Dr. Johnson's opinion was that the principal source of corruption in religion was the endeavour to "substitute something else for morality." Mr. Gladstone, after fifty years' trial of life wrote to the Duchess of Sutherland:—

> There is one proposition which the experience of life burns into my soul: it is this, that man should beware of letting his religion spoil his morality. (ii. p. 185.)

Thus the sense of what is really "required" of us instinctively returns in each generation to the vital simplicity of Israel's ancient prophet.

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER'S new course of theological extension lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" had a splendid start at Nottingham on Monday last. Spite of the drenching downpour of rain a large audience assembled in East Circus-street Hall and listened with unflagging interest to an hour's closely-reasoned argument. There were present one or two Anglican clergymen, a few Free Church ministers, members of the staff of the University College and of the High School. The principals of both the local theological colleges received the Committee's invitation with the utmost courtesy, and the Congregational Institute was represented by a professor and a group of senior students. Mr. Walter E. Evans, the Secretarial Warden of the High Pavement Chapel, introduced Mr. Carpenter, who began his lecture on "Jesus of Nazareth: Prophet and Messiah," by observing that Religion was the greatest fact in human nature, and that the greatest among the historical religions of the world was the religion of Christ. This had proved capable, when carried beyond its native hills, of conquering the two greatest powers of the then known world. Since then it had spread its arms round the globe. This faith was embodied in certain creeds whose origins could be traced. Creeds were an attempt to interpret prior faith and experience. Was Jesus really such as the creeds declared him to have been? There was no way of settling this question except by the methods of historical testimony. There were some who maintained that we could know nothing of Jesus. The lecturer did not share that scepticism. It was true that no detailed biography in the modern sense could be constructed but the spirit and character of his life were sufficiently clear. With a few gleaming strokes a remarkably vivid sketch was then drawn of the public career of Jesus as teacher and Messiah. But what of the much more than this? This raised the subject of miracles. The difficulties were no longer those of thirty years ago as presented for instance in "Supernatural Religion." The discussion now gathered not so much round the idea of the impossibility of a breach of natural law as round the value of evidence as presented by modern historical criticism. The present tendency was to justify miracles by the Incarnation. The question accordingly was not "Is this event on the face of it credible?" but "Is it credible once granting that Jesus was God?" But what then of the miracles of the Old Testament and of the Apostolic age? what of the strange phenomena of modern times and of the general history of religion? Were these also to be justified by an extension of the principle of Incarnation? The natural processes whereby out of existing Messianic elements certain miraculous stories would inevitably be developed were described and illustrated by interesting extra-Christian parallels. Mr. Carpenter concluded by dealing with the question of the Virgin Birth. He pointed out the contradictions of the narratives with each other and even with the very Gospels in which they appeared, and remarked on the significant silence of the rest of the New Testament. One consideration that must not be overlooked was furnished by the attitude of Mary, his mother. It was recorded, for example, that, alarmed for the safety of her first-born, she endeavoured to secure his person on the ground that he was "beside himself." But if she secretly knew that he had been divinely born, how could she have been surprised at his conduct and enthusiasm? These stories were witnesses not to events, but of the love and reverence of the disciples. They were the testimony—the priceless testimony—of the early Church to the greatness of Jesus; they were the imaginative expression of their image of his personality. To get at the real Jesus we must go behind these; but Christendom would never cease to sing the song of the Nativity, "Glory to God in the Highest and on earth peace, goodwill among men." The lecture was well reported in both local daily papers, and has awakened much interest.

The lecture was also given on Tuesday in the Unitarian Church, Lewisham, and on Wednesday at Richmond, in the Free Church, Ormonde-road, to good audiences of thoughtful and deeply-interested people, though the attendance did not equal that at Nottingham, estimated at about 250.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SYROPHŒNICIAN WOMAN.

SIR,—I have postponed the necessary rejoinder to Mr. Barrow's terse and vigorous criticism of my article, in case some other correspondent should desire to intervene. The critical principles on which he defends the narrative are of general validity, but their application in this instance is very questionable.

The "moral and spiritual faith," which was to be excited and tested by the "Irony of Jesus," seem to be excluded by the circumstance that the woman was a heathen and a stranger, whose knowledge of Jesus would be confined to some echo of his fame as a healer. It is not only a "hard saying," but seems to show a lack of delicacy and kind feeling which is inconsistent with the known character of Jesus. Mr. Barrow thinks that that would have been equally clear to the evangelists. But they might very easily have failed to picture the scene, or to realise the force of the words. For Jesus to have spoken them to a woman crying for help in grievous distress would have been a very different matter. And I cannot assume that he had the full and clear knowledge that he was going to put an end to her distress.

There are possibilities of explanation in unknown circumstances, but I am only concerned with probabilities. And a sympathetic look and tone of voice which Mr. Barrow suggests, would have defeated the purpose of the testing "Irony."

He further asks how the omission can be justified when there is nothing to throw suspicion on the genuineness of the text. But I am not suggesting a textual emendation, I look upon the words as an addition to the story before it was fixed in writing. And I gave a reason, independent of their difficulty, on the tendency to assign the leading words to the principal personage. And without them there is a better connection of ideas, though sufficiently subtle to be easily overlooked, and so lead to the alteration.

I prefer my own solution of what is undoubtedly a real difficulty, historical as well as moral. But from the nature of the case it can only be conjectural, not demonstrative. And Mr. Barrow's criticism, from a different viewpoint, is a further reminder of the transforming effect of circumstances and conditions which may be entirely out of our knowledge. C. D. BADLAND.

SIR,—Under whatever figure of speech to suit grammarians the words of Jesus —Matthew xv. 26; Mark vii. 27—be put, we should do well to consider them as they stand recorded.

There is an open-air, work-a-day character about them whereto high biological, critical, theological, and textual estimates in the study may not perhaps do justice.

To their teacher, at the time removed from the usual scenes of ministry and in search of quietness, comes the appeal from his disciples to silence her who is demanding on behalf of her daughter curative relief.

Accordingly, and in good faith, as it could be alleged, the plea of exemption is put forth. National preference is valid. There is a disqualification against the case. A simile avails to embody it. Domestic animals are upon tolerance, not household footing. Be this as it may, mother wit succeeds in overcoming reluctance. And the Saviour saves the situation.

People of a certain turn of mind fancy that the thought of Jesus fore-instructed the petitioner, and guided the colloquy. More seemly appears the conviction that many of the Gospel incidents speak for themselves, and need little refinement of diction and less elaboration of hypotheses. They occurred.—Yours, &c., R. J. ORR.

THE SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Your report of an address delivered by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter says that the Southern Unitarian Association was founded in 1803. This is incorrect. The Southern Unitarian Society was founded in 1801. Not until 1877, by a union of the Southern Unitarian Society with the Southern Unitarian Fund Society, founded in 1815, was the Southern Unitarian Association created.

Some time ago I drew up a list of the Annual Meetings of the Southern Unitarian Society from 1801 to 1831. The list is defective as hitherto I have been unable to discover where the Society met in 1803 and 1804. Can any of your readers supply the information?

THE CAVES OF SARK.

To make le tour de l'île, or go round the island in a boat, is one of the "things to do" when one settles down in Sark for a short or a long visit. There is nothing hackneyed in this expedition, which may be repeated again and again, with variations; for at each round the tide is different, and gives chances of exploring different caves.

A boat must be hired, and reliable fishermen chosen; and the start is made about eleven in the morning from the Creux harbour, which lies on the east coast of the island. The boat, if taking an easterly course, comes first to Derrible cave, with its dark, weird entrance, jumble of rocks, pebbly beach, and winding passages. This romantic Derrible, suggestive of dark deeds, impresses one with a feeling of expectancy and excitement. But this feeling passes away as the next cave is entered; it has a high domed roof, and its floor is of the most tender shade of rose-pink under the clear grey water of the shadowy place. One wonders if this exquisite colouring has given the cave its quiet name of "Pigeon," and in every fibre one feels the soothing influence of the spot.

The boat glides into the sunlight again for a short distance; then, at the mouth of a channel of sparkling green sea, the fishermen rise, and with skilled grace, take the boat up the channel into the Coupée cave or Convanche chasm. The light pours in through three entrances, and falling on the translucent sea, it makes it of a brilliancy and delicacy quite indescribable, and for colour, the water is eau-de-nil touched with gold. Above, the cave towers to majesty and darkness. It is almost a relief to leave it and have a quiet stretch of rowing past the coast of Little Sark, till there has been a breathing space in which to brood over the beauties of this wonderful Coupée Cave.

Presently, the boat turns and makes for the rocks lying at the south of Little Sark; here one gets out and clambers up to a pool of deep, clear water, completely hidden under a great boulder, a blue mirror reflecting the summer sky. It is well named Venus's Bath. After the boat is reached again, it is time for lunch; and there is a good place for a halt close at hand. A mass of rock, rugged and steep, called Bretagne Uset, rises from the crystal water; and here are crevices, cool and dark, where the lunch basket is placed, while one eats and drinks and feasts one's eyes on the opposite coast, on the water where long sashes of brown weed trail idly, on the picturesque fishermen in the boat, and on the pearly distance, where, far away, England lies.

After lunch and the return to the boat, Port Gorey is passed. It is a creek running up between grassy cliffs, on whose slopes lies the blackberry covered shaft of a disused silver mine. In the creek, the water is deep emerald, shadowed with purple above sea-weed beds. Rounding the point of Little Sark, one drifts onwards in an afternoon dream till the boat is taken into byways between rocks, and one gets out to explore Creux Blanc and Noir, "close together with a narrow coupée between them." Here grow wonderful specimens of Asplenium marinum, washed by a trickling streamlet which creeps from the top of the cave and meanders over the ferns to the pebbly floor.

Once again, the boat glides onwards, past Grande Grève, the noble bay below the Coupée, or isthmus, joining Little Sark to Great Sark; then it enters a quiet fiord beside Moie des Orgeries, a mass of rock jutting out of the perpendicular heights of the west coast of Great Sark. The next cave to be explored is Victor Hugo's, so named by the master himself, who wrote of the wild coasts of the Norman Isles, of "the strife and stress of Nature's warring things." The channel entrance of this cave is wide and heaving, even on a gentle summer day; but the cave itself is not so remarkable as some others. After rowing past Havre Gosselin, the boat crosses the Gouliot passage and moors before the caves, which are of world-wide renown and need an article to themselves. The heart of the series, the Inner or Tubularia Cave, is beautiful beyond expression; the walls are covered with anemones of every kind; the roof soars into mystery and blackness; the sea creeps in through a narrow channel, whose walls are golden with anemones dripping with diamonds of sea-spray. Its floor is crimson, and the still sea has a deep peacock sheen.

After the Gouliots have been explored, the boat goes on its way till it turns into the Moie de Monton, whose square portal is decorated with Asplenium marinum. The boat cannot go far, even if the tide serves well, and one gets out and scrambles through a rocky nave into the heart of the cave, where are deep pools and darkness, and a light is necessary. Moie de Monton is grand and sublime, the cathedral of the Sark caves, and rugged in its simplicity. There is a fine nameless ave in Saignie Bay, where one penetrates into the very bowels of the earth. Near the north point of Sark is another weird series of glorious caves called Les Boutiques, supposed once to have been the haunts of smugglers. These caves too need an article to themselves; it is an event in one's life to explore them, with a tunnel 200 feet long, full of shallow pools lying over sea-weed and brilliant pebbles, and roofed with black and white rock; with a large cave looking out to sea, and, at the back, a black escalier of boulders leading to a cave upstairs, as it were, in the heart of the cliff.

Rounding to the east coast, past the Eperquerie moorland, one comes to the Red Cave, then to the Dog Cave, and, finally, to the sweetest, perhaps, of all the caves. It is called Les Cagnons, and it has three parts. In the middle one, the wall of rock at the far end rises like a mystic reredos of brilliant, yet subdued colouring, and the cool sea laps against it with a sound of chanting. To the right is a dark side chapel, where the water is still and black and deep; but to the left, another side chapel is jubilant with the foam of waves over broken rocks, and golden with sunlight, which streams down through a natural window in the rock.

Les Cagnons is the last of the caves, and the boat returns homeward into the Creux harbour. So le tour de l'île is over, for once only, but not for ever. Every time it is made there are new beauties to be seen, new effects to be studied, and new memories to be treasured. The coast of Sark is majestic as a dream of sea-palaces; the caves of Sark are the realisation of the loveliest and wildest fairy tales. ELLEN MARY ROBIN.

LAYMEN'S CLUB.—An adjourned meeting of the Club was held on Wednesday evening, at the Inns of Court Hotel, to afford an opportunity to members of discussing the address given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on October 22 on "Church Organisation," and fully reported in our last number. Dr. Herbert Smith presided, and an interesting discussion ensued, showing the utmost variety of opinion. There are now 86 members of the Club, so that the total of 100 allowed by the rules appears likely soon to be reached. Intending members should make immediate application to the officers.

PROFESSOR GROENEVEGEN, of Leiden, who acted as treasurer for the International Council meetings at Amsterdam, has been in London this week. He preached on Sunday morning in the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, and on Tuesday evening lectured in the same place on the Moral Life and its relation to Religion. Next February Professor Knappert is to pay a similar visit to London, and in March the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam.

THE November number of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day consists of a lecture on "The Beginnings of the Doctrine of the Incarnation," which the author says in a note will probably be incorporated in whole or in part in a handbook on the Doctrine of the Incarnation, which he has been asked to prepare.

THE photograph of some of the chief members of the International Council at Amsterdam, and some other folk, is a pleasant memorial of those delightful meetings, though it is only moderately successful. The grouping appears to have been too hurriedly done, and the central figure will be strange to a good many people, though a good friend of others. Near him, however, are the President, Dr. Oort, Professor Pfleiderer, and the Rev. C. W. Wendte, the general secretary. Some other of the likenesses are admirable, others less happy. Copies of the photograph have now been received at Essex Hall, and orders will be received there, the price of a copy, post free, being 4s.

MR. W. R. MARSHALL, organising secretary of the N.U.T.A. (1, Fordel-road, Catford), writes to call renewed attention to Temperance Sunday. November 29. Some confusion appears to have arisen with an earlier date in October of the U.K.A., but Mr. Marshall will be glad to hear from other ministers, in addition to the fourteen who have already promised to preach special temperance sermons on November 29.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

VI.—THE HIGHER CHOICE.

Matthew vi. 19–34, vii. 13, 14.

JESUS was anxious that all "disciples" should understand that they could not really be "children of God" unless they made up their minds, and prepared them for a great choice. He strove to bring them to the point, like Joshua, when he said, "Choose you this day whom ye will serve"; like Elijah, when he cried, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" In four little parables he showed them what this choosing meant.

I.—THE TWO TREASURES.

You may lay up, he said, treasure on the earth, or you may lay up treasure in heaven; which shall it be? Treasures in those days were hoards of precious metal and costly apparel, very perishable through moth or rust, and very easily stolen. As to earthly treasures, the meaning is clear, but what are heavenly treasures? How do we lay up treasures in heaven? Treasures in heaven are treasures with God, and treasures with God are the things which are precious in His sight, the things which He prizes most, and these, as we have seen, are love and holiness and peace. When we grow up we have it in our power, either to heap up earthly riches for ourselves, and to make these our treasures, or to be "rich toward God" (Luke xii. 21), and to do everything we can to promote peace and love and holiness—the things which He holds dear. If we do the latter, we lay up His treasures, and they become our own also, and they are quite indestructible—moth and rust cannot touch them, and no thief can take them away.

This led on to another thought. You may take it as certain, Jesus said, that where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. A man cannot divide his heart, any more than he can divide his sight; his two eyes see as one, are single, and see either darkness or light. His heart is with that which it loves, and rises towards heaven, or turns towards the earth.

II.—THE TWO MASTERS.

This last thought is now carried a little further. Choosing our treasure, we choose our master. The power of earthly treasures—of money especially—is like that of some terrible god. Mammon ("riches") is the name given to this world-power. How strong Mammon is you may see in Watts's famous drawing. There he sits upon a throne. He has innocence at his mercy, and crushes manhood with his heel. He feels nothing, feels for nothing; his mastery is the mastery of brute strength only. Who could serve such a monster, and at the same time serve God?

III.—THE TWO CARES.

Many of the "disciples" were day-labourers, earning little more than sixpence a day. They could very well say, We are poor men, we shall never come under the power of riches. Jesus reminds them that there is as much danger sometimes in poverty as in wealth. Perhaps they were over-anxious, over-careful, about the morrow, and about such things as food and clothing. Look, he says, at the birds and the flowers, how poor they are, and yet how calm, how free from fretful care! God clothes them, God feeds them; will He not do the same for you? Learn to trust Him. You have other things to think about—much more important—the life itself, and the body itself, and the use you are making of them. God knows all about these lower wants; take thought and provide for the higher; seek first His kingdom, and His righteousness, and these necessaries of life, food, and raiment, shall be added unto you. This is the better plan.

But does this really happen? If we choose the great things, are the small things added? and how? They are added in this way. The earth which God has made can as easily feed and clothe us as it feeds and clothes the birds and flowers. If we all lived the good life, which God would have us live, we should be so diligent in producing, so just in dividing, and so temperate in using, that there would be food and clothing enough for all, and there would be little difficulty in meeting the morrow when it came. Jesus does not say that anxiety would entirely be done away with, but the "evil" of each day would be "sufficient"—enough to make us careful, but not enough to make us fretful.

IV.—THE TWO PATHS.

This is the last of the four parables, and the easiest to understand. We all know what it is sometimes, in a country walk, to choose the wrong road. Here are two roads. One is straitened, and its gate is narrow; the other is broad, and its gate is wide. One is the path of duty, the other is the path of self-pleasing. As they have different beginnings, so they have different endings, for one is the way of life, the other is the way of destruction. We can see how this is: there comes a time when we can no longer please even ourselves; the things which used to please us please us no more, and bodily life shrinks up to nothing; but to please God is to live a life which grows stronger and fuller every day, and that which pleases Him He will not allow to die. The pity of it is that a broad road, with a wide gate, every one can see, whilst a narrow path, with a narrow gate, is not always easy to find, and many miss it.

This, then, is the great choice, and in all these four cases, as you will see, the choice is really between choosing only for ourselves and choosing also for God. It seemed to Jesus the saddest of all things that God's will should not be His children's choice. He knows best what is good for them, but He likes them to choose it freely. Many, you may be sure, made up their minds that day, and, from that day to this, the same words have helped countless disciples to make the same choice.

I RESOLVED that, like the sun, so long as my day lasted, I would look on the bright side of everything.—Hood.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN HOLLAND.

THE annual meeting of the Netherlands Protestantenbond, held last week at Zutfen, afforded us a most welcome opportunity of gaining fuller knowledge of the work and workers for liberal religion in Holland. Following close upon the International Council at Amsterdam, there was a special pleasure in meeting warm-hearted friends again, and being admitted to the counsels of their own national union. It was the privilege of the Editor of the INQUIRER to represent the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the National Conference, at the meetings of the Protestantenbond, and to receive on that account a most cordial welcome.

The Netherlands Protestantenbond was founded in July, 1870, at Utrecht, and is according to the first article of its constitution "a Union of those who desire to work together, to further the free development of religious life, both within and without the circle of church fellowships." Membership is open to anyone who is eighteen years of age, who accepts the principles of the Union, and pays an annual subscription of not less than 50 cents. The Protestantenbond, though strictly speaking a society of individual subscribers, is practically a confederacy of local unions, each of which does its work independently, and is self-governing; the central society, through special committees, undertaking certain work in the interests of all. Each local union is represented at the annual meeting of the Protestantenbond, by one or more delegates, in proportion to its number of members, and while other members may take part in the discussions, and share in the stimulus of the annual gatherings, only delegates and members of the general and special committees vote. Members subscribe to their local unions, a fixed proportion of the amount being passed on to the general Fund. Where there are twenty subscribing members, a local union, an "Afdeeling," may be formed, with its own committee and officers. If in any place there are less than twenty members, a group is formed, with a correspondent. The members of such a "Correspondentschap," and the few individual members, who live in solitary places, subscribe directly to the central society. There are more than 18,000 members of the Protestantenbond, gathered for the most part into "Afdeelingen" in every part of Holland. According to the published records for 1902 there were then 157 Afdeelingen, of which twenty had a membership of over 200. The Hague stood first with 1,050 members, and the other largest unions in the following order: Utrecht, 970; Rotterdam, 810; Schiedam, 536; Haarlem, 476; Zwolle, 465; Amsterdam, 457; Dordrecht, 441; Leiden, 352; Enschede, 351; Nijmegen, 345; Arnhem, 300. The greater number of the members belong to the Dutch Reformed Church, but many also are Remonstrants, or Mennonites, or Lutherans, or are Independents, like the members of the Vrije Gemeente at Amsterdam. Thus any one local union may include members of all these different communities; the object of the Protestantenbond is to unite all liberals and to strengthen the work and the testimony of liberal religion in the land.

The work done by the local unions is very various. Some do practically nothing but pay their subscriptions, or are content to have one or two public lectures in the course of the year; others are very active, seeing to the religious education of their young people, supporting large Sunday-schools, circulating liberal religious literature, taking up various kinds of social work. A good many of the unions hold occasional religious services, while more than twenty appear to have fortnightly services, and four unions, those of The Hague, Schiedam, Beilen, and Bussum, have regular Sunday services. The prevailing policy of the Protestantenbond, however, is not to organise a separate religious community, but to strengthen liberalism in the churches to which the members already belong.

In pursuance of this object the annual meetings are held, and special committees are appointed to undertake the supervision of religious instruction, to provide teachers (several of whom are women) and preachers, and to make grants where necessary to the weaker unions; to arrange for lectures and services; to strengthen the work of the Sunday-schools; to help students for the ministry; to see to the publication and distribution of literature; to engage in Postal Mission work. One most influential publication is the weekly paper, De Hervorming, of which the preacher of the International Council Sermon at Amsterdam, the Rev. J. VAN LOENEN MARTINET, is the editor; another is the popular hymn-book of the Union, a collection of 224 "Godsdienstige Liederen," now widely used by the Remonstrants and Mennonites, and other congregations beyond the borders of the Reformed Church.

One special committee of the Protestantenbond is charged with the interests of the liberals in the Reformed Church, and it was in connection with fresh proposals by this committee that one of the burning questions at the annual meeting last week arose. There were, in fact, two such questions; the other was in the matter of finance.

A large part of the work of the Protestantenbond is at present sustained by the generosity of one man, who is giving 100,000 gulden, in donations spread over ten years, with the condition that the money shall not be capitalised, but spent at once in active work. This has led to a considerable extension of activities, and in particular to the appointment of a number of religious teachers. Thus the Committee have a very serious question to face—how to provide means to continue the good work on its present scale of efficiency, when two years hence this one large subscription comes to an end. Small economies will not suffice. It is to be hoped that members generally will respond to the call by a sufficient increase of their own contributions to the Central Fund, to maintain and to carry forward into fresh fields so admirable a work.

The question raised by the Committee for liberals within the Reformed Church was of organisation. Of recent years, orthodox influence has been strongly dominant in the Reformed Church, and especially in the large towns, so that the liberal minority find it increasingly difficult to maintain their position, and in the university town of Leiden, for instance, the stronghold of liberal thought, cannot secure the appointment of a single liberal minister in the Church. It is, therefore, of the utmost consequence that liberals in the Church should be more thoroughly organised, to promote their principles, and in the first instance to secure more adequate representation on the Church Councils, on whom the appointment of ministers depends. The proposal of the special committee, of which Professor EERDMANS, of Leiden, is the secretary, was that in every Afdeeling of the Protestantenbond it should be permitted to the members of the Reformed Church to form a separate "Onderafdeeling," a sub-union, to work for that special interest. This policy was very forcibly advocated by Dr. EERDMANS himself, and by Dr. NIEMEIJER, the secretary of the Protestantenbond, on the ground that it was of vital interest for all liberals that their position in the Reformed Church should be maintained. On the other hand, it was argued that the Protestantenbond, as a union of all the liberals of all churches, ought not to concern itself with the ecclesiastical politics of any one body, though the strongest and most important, and it was feared that the establishment of such sub-unions would tend to division of interest and strength and injure the main religious work of the Protestantenbond. This was the position of the President, Dr. I. VAN DEN BERGH, of Mr. VAN LOENEN MARTINET and others, and it proved to be the prevailing feeling of the meeting, for the motion of the sub-committee was lost by a large majority.

It remains, therefore, for the liberals within the Church to carry out their purpose by means of a separate organisation, and it was abundantly clear from the debate that there are capable and determined men who will see to it that the work is effectively done. The debate at Zutfen, though keen, was carried through with perfect good feeling. It was felt that a momentous decision affecting the future of the Protestantenbond had been arrived at, and it must be the earnest hope of all friends of liberal religion that it may prove eventually to be for the awakening and strengthening of the liberals within the Reformed Church, without in any way weakening the ties which unite all members of the Protestantenbond in loyalty to great principles, and in the brotherly fellowship of common religious work.

THE PROTESTANTENBOND.

ANNUAL MEETING AT ZUTFEN.

THE thirty-third annual meeting of the Netherlands Protestantenbond was held at Zutfen, on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 27 and 28, under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. I. van den Bergh, of Zwolle. About 120 delegates from all parts of the country took part in the proceedings of the business meeting, while the religious service and public meeting, especially the former, were very largely attended. The only delegate from abroad was the Rev. V. D. Davis, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference.

Zutfen is only a small town of some 18,000 inhabitants, on the broad river Ysel, the branch of the Rhine which flows northwards into the Zuider Zee. It has all the charm of an old Dutch town, and a very noble church, the Groote Kerk, where, happily, liberal influences still prevail under the ministry of Dr. A. J. Oort, a brother of Professor Oort, of Leiden. Two sons of our International President were also at Zutfen, one the minister of the Remonstrant Church at Utrecht, the other of the Reformed Church in a village of North Holland. He himself was not able to be there, but friends will be glad to know that he has so far recovered from his recent accident as to be able to walk a short distance and to lecture regularly in his own house.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held in the large hall of a club-house, the Buitensocieteit, in pleasant grounds on the outskirts of the town. The chair was taken by the president, Dr. I van den Bergh, soon after two o'clock on Tuesday, and the business occupied that afternoon and the whole of Wednesday morning and afternoon, with an hour's adjournment for lunch.

The President opened the proceedings with the accustomed "Hamerslag" (which also marked the end of business, and, where necessary, called to order), and reserving his chief address for the public meeting on the following evening, spoke only a few introductory words as to the importance of the business to be dealt with, and expressed the hope, which the subsequent proceedings fully realised, that amid all their differences of opinion true unity of spirit, in accordance with the principles of liberal religion, would prevail. He then turned to the English visitor and on behalf of the Protestantenbond offered a very hearty welcome to the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Speaking in English, he said that they were specially grateful that so soon after the international meetings at Amsterdam this mark of sympathy should be shown by their spiritual kindred across the sea, and that the bonds of fellowship should thus be more closely drawn.

The roll of delegates was then called, and the reports of the general committee and the special committees and the accounts were received and adopted, and the budget for the coming year considered. It is worth noting that, whereas membership in the Protestantenbond was originally strictly confined to men, the treasurer is now a lady, Miss van Berlekom, of 's Hertogenbosch, who showed great capacity and good humour in dealing with knotty points.

We must not attempt a report of all the business. The first session was largely occupied with finance, in the endeavour to secure a full measure of support from all the Afdeelingen, and prepare for the needs of two years hence, when the special subscription of 10,000 gulden a year for ten years will have come to an end. Of one small economy the committee were disappointed: They had proposed to withdraw their subvention of 100 gulden to the Nieuw Leven, a popular weekly paper, which has a large circulation, and was judged capable of standing on its own feet. But the editor made a spirited defence, and the meeting went with him; and not only so, but added another subvention of 100 gulden to De Blijde Wereld, a Christian-Socialist weekly paper edited by three young ministers in Friesland.

The great discussion on the organisation of the liberals in the Reformed Church (referred to in our leading article) took place on Wednesday, when the proposal of the sub-committee was negatived by 76 votes to 29, the roll being called by the President, and each delegate voting Voor or Tegen, or, if undecided, then Blanco.

On Wednesday also, two vacancies on the general committee were filled by the election of Mr. H. J. Lambert, of Rotterdam, and Professor Eerdmans, of Leiden.

An invitation from Dordrecht to hold the next annual meeting there was accepted.

University Education.

One other matter of national importance was dealt with. Professor Bruining, of Amsterdam, who had written a series of articles on the subject, which appeared in Het Nieuws van den Dag of Oct. 27, 28 and 29, called attention to the mischievous results which would follow the passing of a law now before Parliament dealing with University education. The Bill introduced by a reactionary Minister provides for the establishment by voluntary effort of separate Universities, which need not furnish more than three faculties, with three professors in each; and, while in the other two faculties the University standing and adequate scholarship of the men to be appointed as professors is safeguarded, in the faculty of theology it is declared that this is a matter not for State supervision, but for the Church. Thus the door is opened for the establishment of an ill-equipped Roman Catholic or narrowly evangelical University, in which theological professors might be appointed with a view to orthodoxy rather than scholarship. Such an example, it is feared, could only act prejudicially on the older Universities, and lower the standard of scholarship, especially as it is also provided that in the existing Universities any community that desires it, and has adequate means, may establish professorships to represent their own theological standpoint. Dr. Bruining made a strong protest against such a view of theology, as no longer a subject for free scientific study in the University, and an affair only of the Churches, and expressed the earnest hope that in the land of Kuenen and Tiele the policy thus indicated would be strenuously resisted. He moved resolutions, which were unanimously accepted by the meeting, declaring that the establishment of such separate Universities would be injurious to the national life, and instructing the committee to use every means to resist the passing of the law, and if it should be passed, to minimise its evil effects; and, further, declaring that it was of the utmost importance for the Protestantenbond to work for the maintenance of the liberal teaching of theology in the Universities.

Another subject was to have been brought forward by the Rev. S. K. Bakker, one of the editors of the Blijde Wereld, "The significance of the right to strike in the light of our free religious principles"; but for this there was no time left, and the paper is to be published and discussed in the Hervorming.

At the conclusion of the meeting a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the President for the very admirable manner in which he had conducted a large amount of often intricate and delicate business. The business was concluded late on Wednesday afternoon.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

On Tuesday evening, at seven o'clock, religious service was held in the Groote Kerk, conducted by Dr. A. Rutgers van der Loeff, of 's Hertogenbosch, who preached an eloquent and very earnest sermon. The service was most impressive. A congregation of some 900 people gathered about the lofty pulpit in the great church, a strong choir being at the back, and the members of the Protestantenbond and people of the town completing the circle.

The opening hymn of devotion, a rendering of the Psalm, "O God, our God, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth." was sung by the choir, without organ accompaniment, and with great feeling. This was followed by prayer, after which the preacher read his text, Matt. v, 13-16, "Ye are the salt of the earth, . . . the light of the world. . . . Let your light shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your father who is in heaven." Choir and congregation then sang together a verse expressing the sentiment of the text, and the sermon began.

"Welcome!" was the first word; welcome to all gathered there, to the members of the Protestantenbond who came to seek consecration for their meetings, to find their strength in God; welcome to the Reformed Church of Zutfen! It was a great privilege to worship in that great and beautiful church, when from so many of the churches of the land they were shut out. They were thankful to Zutfen for receiving them there.

Then the preacher reminded his hearers of the anniversary of October 31, near to which they always held their annual meetings, the Reformation Day, on which, in 1517, Martin Luther nailed his theses to the church door in Wittenberg; and he pictured the great scenes in the life of the reformer, his brave stand at the Diet of Worms, what he did in giving the Bible to his people in their mother tongue. The theology of Luther was no longer theirs, but his piety of heart, his courage of conviction and nobility of character must always be precious to them. They still sang his battle song of the Reformation, "A mighty fortress is our God." His spirit was theirs also, in the freedom with which Christ had made them free. They also had the joy of the new light, through their free reading of the Bible, finding new treasures there.

At this point the choir sang another hymn of aspiration, and the sermon then proceeded. The history of the reformation, the preacher said, was repeated, though in different forms, in their own time, both deriving their inspiration from the true light as it shone in Jesus, in love of God and man, the simple religion of the spirit. They rejoiced in the free interpretation of Scripture, which preserved to them the imperishable treasures, with reason and conscience unfettered, so that they carried on the true reformation work. They kept Protestantism protestant, free and reverent, and made the light of Jesus shine all the clearer to the world. Rich and strong they felt, in the simple religion of Jesus.

Finally, he exhorted them to see to it that those words were true of them, that they did really understand the light which shone for them, and that it might not be with shame that they recalled those great words about the salt. Fifty years ago there had been glorious eager life in their fellowship, making its way in the true spirit of the Reformation; and why, he asked, were they not stronger now, more deeply impressed, more faithful in the doing of helpful work in the world? They must seek for a fuller measure of the true life; in the love that unites, seeking always those things which are honourable, pure, and lovely, and of good report. In all humility they must receive that word of Jesus, and be the light of the world and the salt, fearlessly true to themselves, speaking out, strong in righteousness, gentle in love. The world was still much in darkness, needing true pity and love and holiness, just what they could give. The hope of the people was in the principles they maintained. With impassioned appeal he exhorted them to stand fast, and sing the great reformer's song. "God help us," he concluded, "in our weakness, our want of faith! Amen." After the sermon two verses of Luther's hymn, "A mighty fortress is our God," were sung, the first by the choir, the second by choir and congregation together, and the service was at an end.

Later in the evening a reception was held by the Zutfen Afdeeling at a club (De Groote Societeit) in town, in the course of which Dr. A. J. Oort, who presided, offered a warm welcome to all friends, with a further special word of welcome in English to the English visitor. Grateful acknowledgment was also made to Dr. Rutgers van der Loeff for his sermon of that evening.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

At the conclusion of the business on Wednesday the delegates dined together in festive mood in the Schouwburgzaal, when many toasts grave and gay were duly honoured, and at eight o'clock a largely attended public meeting was held in the hall of the Buitensocieteit.

Dr. I. VAN DEN BERGH presided, and after the singing of an opening hymn, delivered his address. He reminded his hearers that it was seven years ago that he came to Zutfen to explain to them the principles of the Protestantenbond, and induced them to form an Afdeeling. Now he was more impressed than ever with the importance of publicly maintaining the principles and truths of liberal religion. The Amsterdam Congress had wonderfully strengthened their faith, and they had come away with the conviction that a sacred task of propaganda was theirs, and that a mission work was laid upon them. They had been too long ignored, or misrepresented and misunderstood. They must lay aside their neutrality and bear their testimony by the spoken and written word, for the best treasures of the religious life were entrusted to them. They ought not to feel it a drawback that they had no creed to put before the people; each one must fearlessly and clearly speak out his own conviction, and they must lay stress on religious thought, for that was what the people needed. Social work was good, and if it sprang from a religious motive it was a testimony of true religion. The thought of God as Father belonged to true brotherhood, and they must help men to true thought of God, and show that religion bore upon every side of life. Because they had strong conviction, therefore they must speak. They might not yet have the large plans of their English friends, but the time for sitting still had gone by. They must go out to the people with their five loaves and two fishes, as messengers, by reason of the calling with which God had called them. In deep earnestness they must feel that there was work for them all to do.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS was the next speaker, introduced by the President as the representative of the English Unitarians. In four sentences of fearless Dutch he acknowledged the cordial welcome he had received, and regretted that his capacity went no further, and he must be content to speak in English. He then delivered the greetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference and spoke of the happiness of being present at such meetings, where the bonds of sympathy were so strong, in loyalty to common principles and the pursuit of a common religious work. It was a special pleasure to be in Holland again so soon after the Amsterdam meetings, and to assure them of the delight which all the English visitors had found in those meetings and the warm hospitality with which they had been received. There was an additional reason which made an Englishman glad to be at Zutfen, for there, outside the walls, in the great days of Elizabeth, the English had fought side by side with the Dutch against the Spanish tyranny, and there Sir Philip Sidney had fallen. The memory of his noble heroism was familiar to them all. His act in giving up a cup of cold water to a dying soldier, whose need, he said, was greater than his own, and his silent testimony of faith when he was dying and past all speech, in answer to a question, crossing his hands upon his breast, might be to them a parable of the great truths of the religious life—the secret of unselfishness, the giving of self in the service of others and reverent trust in God, the Father of all. Of such a life they all might learn; in that spirit alone could they be strong for the work to which they were called. He then spoke briefly of the work in England, the enlarged opportunities of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and what was being done to meet the fresh calls to service, and concluded with a renewed expression of faith and hope in the principles and aspirations in which the liberal churches of Holland and of England are at one.

At the conclusion of Mr. Davis's speech, the President again expressed their gratitude for that interchange of sympathy, and with a warm grasp of the hand bade him deliver their thanks and their cordial greetings to the friends in England.

Then followed a paper on "What a Liberal congregation expects of its minister," read by a friend, in the absence of the writer, Mr. J. G. Ch. Joosting, of Assen, and finally, Professor Knappert, of Leiden, gave a glowing account of the International Congress at Amsterdam, drawing from it lessons of fresh devotion and enthusiasm in the common work. Towards the conclusion he quoted from Mr. Armstrong's sermon on the meetings, and associated himself with the regret there expressed that there had not been more opportunities for united devotion. They ought, Dr. Knappert urged, not to be so self-contained, but should give freer expression to the devout life which was in their hearts.

The meeting concluded with the singing of the same hymn which brought the meetings at Amsterdam to a close,

"In U, O God! zijn onze harten."

AMERICAN UNITARIANS.

HIGH IDEALS.

At the recent American National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, held at Atlantic City, N.J., the address of the Council was presented by the chairman, the Rev. Thomas R. Slicer. Having recounted various activities of church, school, and college in the service of liberal religion, with a strong plea for ampler resources to meet the great claims of the hour, the address continued :—

A Great Responsibilty.

Our nation has won for itself a place of distinction in the family of nations; this is a time when power should be the guarantee of peace. Happily, in our churches that peace is assured. We have no contention or controversy to divert our energies from constructive work. We see on every hand the triumph of those principles for which our fathers had to do battle. What was once unwillingly allowed is now eagerly accepted and cordially invited by many who do not belong to our group of churches. We do not claim that it is our triumph, but we plead that these conditions should be celebrated by their appropriate fruits. When a people is at peace with the world, when its wealth and power make it the eye of the world's vision, when religious toleration rises to the height of spiritual sympathy, which a better understanding brings to good will, it becomes us to rise to the sense of our responsibility, and to prove the freedom we have proclaimed: the free mind which dares all thought; the free spirit which dares all adventure; the free hand which dispenses all benefits. Ours is a singular responsibility. We have a great history, which makes its claim upon us that it be in no way dishonoured. There was a time when our churches furnished the leaders in every great social reform. The literature of America in the last century was, for the most part, an exhibit of the mind of Unitarian men and women. If we now occupy a position less conspicuous, it is because we are part of an era more marked by industrial enterprise than by spiritual eagerness.

Part of a Wider Movement.

We are no longer singular, because the rise of the tide of free thought has covered the inequalities which its ebb laid bare. The great truths which our fathers enunciated are now the familiar utterance of the common people. The reforms for which they contended are now either established or no longer fought for as a forlorn hope. It is no longer necessary to guard against our influence as dangerous. Our principles have become the daily liturgy of many who have forgotten the earlier exposition of the very truths they announce as their own. Said Samson, "If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle;" but we rejoice that mystery does not now so much pique curiosity as that expectation waits upon the dawn of truth. For while priests struggle to maintain a footing upon the steps of those altars on which already human interests mark a rising tide; while Scriptures, being of no private interpretation, are threatened by public neglect; while the sense of power imperils the sense of God, and achievements in science make men question the visions of faith—our free churches hold strongly their own among the denominations which lament the abandoment of the services of religion. There was never a time when so many men and women were thinking of life in terms of confidence in an ordered world. No man among us weakly regrets that the world's work occupies the modern minister, who leads in the sanctities of the common life. If the older sanctities have been invaded, it is only that they may be distributed. If theology be neglected, it is because the claim as to what is theologically true has yielded its place to that which is philosophically necessary.

A New Consecration.

But, in these changed conditions appearing upon the outer margins of a noble career, our faith must hear a call to a new consecration. We have vindicated the rights of free thought. Can we establish the virtues of free minds? What challenge do we hear that the free thinker shall also be a sound reasoner—his liberty guaranteed by his sanity?

On every hand we see the effort of the human soul to claim its rights against neglect. The very energy which is put forth to material ends is soul-energy producing wealth and power, and, alas! also a confidence in these by virtue of which "the gain of the world" threatens "the loss of the soul!" We witness the utmost investment of spiritual energy, and often only a railroad system or a merger of industrial interests results. It was soul: it is a corporation. And yet serious men feel that, however splendid the era of enterprise, the captains of industry are not a substitute for the prophets of religion. Neither can unconquerable faith be merged in an unconscionable "trust." The supplications of the saints are not compensated by the rise of inordinate desires; nor are the meditations of the soul alone well replaced by the murmurs of those who "wall themselves up in dreams."

There must be found some way by which this inevitable development of resources for the larger life shall be transmuted into motive power for the higher life. Pathetic efforts appear on every side, vainly striving and sincerely failing to state anew the terms on which the soul may live. New psychologies, new brotherhoods, new liturgies, would fain recover for the soul territory taken over by the senses. They are the clamour of the human soul against its prolonged neglect. But no permanent gain can come if tumultuous feeling be substituted for clear thinking, or the terminology of science be used to disguise the inadequacy of reasoning. A diluted transcendentalism vainly pours its tiny stream through channels cut by freshets of an earlier time; and confused minds are urged to believe that what is forgotten never really came into existence.

Spiritual Realities.

In the midst of this singular and kaleidoscopic assembly of opinions it becomes us to stand for the great realities, and to deal with them at first hand, as of old. Under all mental aberrations the points of the compass remain cardinal for him who would find his way. We may still steer by the stars which we vainly seek to reach. The churches are necessary still as schools of religion and centres of worship. That worship cannot be "enriched" except by deeper experiences of the inner life. There must be leisure enough for meditation and prayer. Some one must still be found who can not only pray over our dead, but so inspire the living that "death shall be swallowed up of life." The simplicity which adorned our earlier leaders may well become us still. If we are richer, let it not alter the estimate we set upon the common virtues of a more frugal time. If we are more knowing, let it appear that we know more as to the conduct of life. The proof of our freedom is to be seen in this power to achieve the freedom of other men.

Religion in the World.

There are conditions in this whole situation which we as Unitarians cannot repudiate if we would. Why should we say that we "accept the religion of Jesus" if we ignore that adjustment of human relations which was the very secret of its ethical meaning? Why should we claim that "practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man" if we do not urge the pacification of those industrial antagonisms which do not so much hinder our enterprises as they shame our humanity? The increase of resources has become an incentive to hate, and the organization of industries leads to the equipment of relentless opposition between interests identical. Is it not possible to cast the weight of our own men of affairs into the scale of good will? There is no industrial prize worth hating another man to gain. We call upon our far-seeing, strong men of affairs to form one company more, to organise yet one combination, the brotherhood of the common life, which shall dedicate its wealth, intelligence, and moral power to find a solution of the industrial problems which no one can solve alone. Armed hate over the gifts of God is a monstrous condition to appear in the twentieth century in a land of unexampled wealth and fecundity, among a people unequalled in history for fertility of resource and power of production.

It might be possible to excuse supineness in those who believe in the total depravity of human nature and the suffering of the innocent to save the guilty; but for us on whose banner appears the legend of "the dignity of human nature," "humanity not ruined, but incomplete," there can be no extenuation for indifference. We must unite our great professions to great performance, and find a way out of industrial war consistent with the dignity of human nature.

Other matters were then dealt with, and the address concluded :—

A New Era of Faith:

We are used to the charge of the smallness of our denomination. Denomination-are counted, men and women are weighed. The very simplicity of our message makes it ill-understood by a sophisticated time. Its primitive meaning is lost in the tangle of theological definition. Its worship in the spirit seems bare and uninviting to those who expect the glory of the Apocalypse to precede the descent of the City of God among men. But these are only difficulties to the unthinking and to the unbelieving.. There is an era of faith to be inaugurated, which one of our own number has finely described as "the conviction that there is a something in the universe which corresponds to our best." In an age in which the human soul has been discovered under the limitations of every instrument of sense, by contact with a sympathetic hand; in an age when Laura Bridgman and Helen Keller have been made familiars of all nature and learning by a single touch of loving fingers upon the lips—need any man despair because dull minds refuse our call to the higher life or sordid natures hear our appeal unmoved? Rather let each of us offer here by the great sea that prayer which first found utterance above the rising tide of misunderstanding and reproach: let us pray in the spirit of Theodore Parker, the apostle of free faith:—

Give me, Lord, eyes to behold thy truth;
A seeing sense that knows the Eternal right;
A heart with pity filled, and gentlest ruth;
A manly faith that makes all darkness light;
Give me the power to labour for mankind;
Make me the mouth of such as cannot speak;
Eyes let me be to groping men, and blind;
A conscience to the base, and, to the foolish, mind,
And lead still further on such as thy kingdom seek.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE one subject which engrosses the attention of all interested in our Yorkshire churches is the "Grand County Bazaar," which is to be held in Leeds at the end of this month. Of its success we can have no doubt, though that we shall get the whole £5,000 which is what we require we scarcely dare to hope. But we have succeeded already, both in getting donations and promises to a larger amount than the Union has ever before had at its disposal, and in uniting us in a common work and object. "Something to do;" that is the great need of many who cannot be lay preachers or even Sunday-school teachers, and for the lack of it they grow cold and indifferent. A bazaar, whatever be the theoretical objections to this way of raising money, has these two great and indisputable merits: first, that it is effective as a means of raising money; people will give to a bazaar, even those who do not like it, much more liberally than they will to a mere subscription list. And they are justified in this preference by the fact, of which they are perhaps imperfectly conscious, that they are asked to give to a common effort in which rich and poor alike are doing their best. And this is the second merit; a bazaar finds employment for all, and with employment kindles interest and enthusiasm. Persons who would have to make an effort and a sacrifice to give five or ten shillings to a collection will give indirectly in work and goods a much larger sum cheerfully and easily. Indeed, many can give time and skill who can give little else, and these they are proud and glad to give. This is the first time in its long history that the Mill Hill congregation has had to do with a bazaar otherwise than as a benevolent outsider, subscribing and purchasing. Now we are concerned in one and mainly responsible for it, not, indeed, for any pecuniary benefit to ourselves, but for the sake of the poorer churches and the common cause which have always looked to us for support. I am, for one, heartily pleased that we have been so drawn in, for it has drawn us more closely together; and we shall get our profit out of it in better way than in money.

Of course, this is not a Leeds bazaar, and we have done our utmost to ensure that it shall not be looked upon as such. Many other congregations are doing their best to make it a success, and if it could have been managed we would have had chairmen and openers to represent all parts of this great county. As finally arranged, Mr. Sharpe, the President of the British and Foreign, who opens on the Friday, will represent the interest of Unitarians throughout the Empire and the world in our undertaking, and Sheffield will take the chair in the person of its new minister on Saturday. The only matter of regret so far is that we have failed to persuade all our churches to join in the work. The reasons of holding aloof are various, but, though they were of the best, we should be sore to miss from among the stalls of a Yorkshire bazaar the names of York and Wakefield and Scarborough. If all our congregations realised that in helping others they are doing the best for themselves, and they gain who give, we should have none left out from our list of co-operators in this effort for the common good.

I am writing in the train, and have, of course, no opportunity of turning over my files of the INQUIRER to see when I last wrote and what I then reported. But I think it is since then Mr. Manning terminated his ministry at Sheffield. To give to the important congregation at Upper Chapel all the care it needed, and at the same time fulfil the duties of Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament at the Home Missionary College, was a double task which few men would have been able to carry on for years, as Mr. Manning did without complaint against him of neglect of duty from either side. The congregation to which he so ably ministered is to be congratulated on having persuaded the Rev. C. J. Street to leave his very successful work at Bolton to come to them. He cannot be a better preacher than was his predecessor, but he will have the advantage of being able to devote his whole time to the work, and I earnestly trust that under his ministry Sheffield will take the place which is due to it, side by side with Leeds, in the management and support of the Union. Mr. Street had an enthusiastic welcome last month, and the testimony of leading members of his previous congregation, who had come from Bolton to attend the meeting, proved that he was deserving of the fair hopes entertained of his work at Sheffield.

We owe it to the energy of our Union Secretary, Mr. Basil Lupton, that the question of the Selby Chapel, debated these twenty years, has at length and finally been settled. We had in that market town an interesting old chapel, built at the end of the seventeenth century. The situation was from some points of view objectionable and the congregation very small. Should it be pulled down and another built on a more suitable site? or on the same site? or could it be repaired and improved? The answer was in part given by the building itself, which threatened to fall upon the heads of the few who met there for worship. So it was perforce abandoned some years ago, first for an iron church, the gift of Mrs. Barmby, and then, when that proved too cold and draughty, for the little room where for a century past the day-school, of which the minister was the master, had been held. The old chapel fell into ruin and was a monument to our failure at Selby, till Mr. Lupton took the matter in hand and by himself got the funds and had a neat and unpretentious building erected on the old site. So that is satisfactorily settled, let us hope, for at least a hundred years to come.

Pudsey, owing to the escapade of its young and popular minister, Mr. Davis, who abandoned his post without an hour's warning, has been for a year dependent on the services of its own members and local preachers, with occasional visits from the pastors of neighbouring churches; and bravely has the congregation maintained the cause despite of serious losses by death to add to their difficulties. But at last they have obtained a minister who has the advantage of Mr. Davis, that he has had a full training for the sacred business upon which he has entered. Mr. Lockett was one of the students of Manchester College who completed the full course of theological studies and received a certificate last June. He has learnt much, and will have much to teach his congregation. He will have still more to learn of them, for they are genuine Yorkshire folk, plain spoken, and expecting a full return for what they give, but responsive to every effort made to serve them, and supporting their minister to the utmost of their ability. A young man could not have a better post at which to make a beginning of pastoral work.

Holbeck is sore at losing Mr. Cook, who has been called up higher. He has left us to take the responsible post of Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, which has been filled by so many men distinguished among us for their zeal and learning. But his late congregation will not suffer alone.

Mr. Cook was one who had the interests of all our churches much at heart; he was an active worker for the Union, and always willing to do anything and go anywhere in the service of our common cause. The members of the Mill Hill Social Union, to whom he was well known, took the opportunity of a meeting falling on the eve of his departure to bid him farewell, and presented him with Mr. Morley's "Life of Gladstone" as a small token of the sincerity of the regard and good wishes which were expressed for him and Mrs. Cook. We hope Holbeck will soon find a worthy successor to console them for their loss. There is good work to be done by an able and earnest man, and such a one may rely on the support both of his own people and of Mill Hill.

If only this big county could contract a little, and our churches be drawn nearer together, I think half our difficulties would cease. But half would remain. For the isolation which does us so much harm, the indifference of people to the interests of all congregations except that to which they happen to belong—this is not due merely to distance. We sorely need to realise that early Christian ideal of a universal Church, which happened to be localised here and there, but was in itself above temporary and local conditions. A "cause," we call it, something worth living for, and, if need be, dying for; something quite different from a congregation, or building, or town. The cause of religion, and free inquiry fearless of results, and the service of man as truest Divine Service, it is for this we stand wherever we have a humble meeting-house or costly church. This is common to all of us, conservatives in theology or men of advanced views, and surely this is worth our striving for and giving for. The cause at this or that spot is but a poor thing, and sometimes we are tempted to despair of it, but at large it is noble and sublime; and we should recruit our failing energies, exhausted in petty efforts, by contemplating the great issues towards which all our individual labours tend.

CHAS. HARGROVE.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Birmingham: Newham Hill.—On Sunday, October 25, large congregations were present when the Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth concluded his eleven years of ministry at Newhall Hill Church. After the evening service the chairman of the Vestry Committee, on behalf of the members of the church and schools, presented Mr. Charlesworth with a valuable gold watch and chain, and Mrs. Charlesworth a silver tea service. The watch bears an inscription recording the congregation's high esteem and appreciation of Mr. Charlesworth's earnest and faithful labours.

Bridgend and Wick.—The Induction Services of the Rev. David Rees as minister of the Newcastle Old Meeting House, Bridgend, and the General Baptist Chapel, Wick, were held on Monday and Tuesday, October 26 and 27. The weather was everything that is unfavourable, and no one could have been surprised if, under the circumstances, the attendances had been small. They were, on the contrary, large, and the services and meetings connected with them were in every way most successful, being characterised by great heartiness, helpfulness, and unanimity. The fraternal feeling of the ministers of the district was borne witness to by the presence of seven of their number in addition to Mr. Rees, while letters of apology were read from others that only the inclemency of the weather prevented their attendance. There were present Revs. D. R. Davis (Pentre), D. Evans (Cwmbach), J. P. Kane (Dowlais), T. J. Jenkins (Gellionen), W. J. Phillips (Nottage), H. F. Short (Aberdare), D. J. Williams (Merthyr, and Secretary of S.E. Wales Unitarian Society). The Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Evesham, was also present, visiting the district on behalf of the B. and F.U.A. For the evening service at Bridgend on the Monday every seat on the ground floor of the old chapel was occupied. The first part of the service was conducted in English by Rev. H. F. Short, and Rev. R. Davis preached on "What our Churches stand for." After the service short addresses of a very cordial nature were delivered in English and Welsh by various ministers present. At Wick on Tuesday afternoon, there was a good attendance at the interesting old chapel; "a sacred shrine," as several of the speakers in the course of the proceedings said it must be to the inhabitants of the district. The first part of the service was conducted in Welsh by Rev. J. P. Kane (Dowlais) and the sermon, also in Welsh, was preached by Rev. T. J. Jenkins. The service was followed by short but very interesting addresses in English and Welsh by each of the nine ministers present. After tea, at which ministers and visitors were hospitably entertained by the Wick friends, there were between ninety and one hundred present at the evening service. The first part of the service was conducted by Rev. D. R. Davis, the English sermon, on "The Relation of Minister and Congregation" by Rev. Rudolf Davis, and the Welsh sermon by Rev. D. Evans. In the course of the proceedings, on the motion of Rev. D. Rees, seconded by the Rev. D. J. Evans, a cordial vote of thanks was unanimously passed to the B. and F.U.A., for their interest and help, and acknowledged by the Rev. R. Davis.

Bury: Bank Street (Resignation).—The Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., has resigned the pulpit of Bank-street Chapel, and will conclude his ministry there at the end of the present year, after nearly nine years of service. Mr. Odgers, as we have already announced has accepted the pulpit of Ullet-road Church, Liverpool.

Dudley (Appointment).—The Rev. Alfred Thompson, who has recently been received into our fellowship, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the Old Meeting, and will enter on his duties early in the new year. The warm gratitude of the congregation has been expressed to the Rev. G. St. Clair for the services he has rendered, while in temporary charge of the pulpit.

Horsham.—At the Band of Mercy meeting on Tuesday lantern slides, illustrating the Life of Gladstone, were shown, the connecting readings being given by Mr. W. Larring. A collection on behalf of the Macedonian relief fund was taken at the close. By the death of Miss Emma Caffin, which took place at her residence at Leapale on Sunday evening, the Horsham congregation loses the last member of that name which has been associated with its history through all its records, and the denomination an intelligent and life-long adherent. Her body was laid to rest on Wednesday afternoon in the graveyard of the old chapel, the service being conducted by the Rev. J. J. Marten.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—On Thursday and Friday evenings, October 9 and 30, a further effort was made in the movement to reduce the debt upon the buildings, by a performance of Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night," when a remarkable success was achieved. Everything connected with the performance, except orchestral music, was done by persons directly associated with the church, including scene painting and the making of the costumes, the latter being very artistic and rigorously Elizabethan. After a long course of painstaking rehearsal, a firm grasp was obtained of the characterisation, and a penetrating insight into the text; so that the rendering was both accurate and scholarly.

London: Mansford Street.—The Rev. John Ellis was on Monday returned at the Borough Council Election for Bethnal Green, standing third for the South Ward, with 1,050 votes. The thirty-sixth annual gathering of "Old Scholars" of Spicer-street and Mansford-street was held on Wednesday, Nov. 4. The schoolroom was well decorated with evergreen and flowers, kindly provided by Lady Durning Lawrence, Mrs. Crompton Jones, and Mr. E. B. Squire. The Rev. John Ellis, on behalf of the present teachers and scholars, gave a welcome to the visitors, responded to on behalf of the visitors by Mr. A. J. Clarke. The meeting was a great success.

London: Plumstead.—At the Borough Council election, on Monday, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones was again triumphantly returned with a splendid majority for the St. Margaret's Ward. During the past month, Mr. Jones delivered a series of week night discourses on "Problems of Modern Religious Thought," which were fairly successful in point of view of numbers, and attracted many inquiring strangers. During the present month the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, is to give four lectures on "Evolution," illustrated by lantern slides, on successive Wednesday evenings, beginning Nov. 11.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The fifty-third annual meeting was held on Saturday week in the Memorial Hall. There was unfortunately a smaller attendance than usual owing to important functions at several of the district churches, which could not be foreseen or avoided. It was all the more unfortunate, in view of the most interesting and helpful address delivered by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale. After tea, the Rev. Charles Roper, president, occupied the chair, and the proceedings opened with hymn and prayer. The President, in the course of his address, referred to the continued popularity of the Free Trade Hall Whit Sunday Festival; and with regard to criticisms as to the increasing number of people who were away on holiday that week-end, he said that no building of our own could possibly hold half the scholars and friends who came, and that it would be a fatal mistake, in his opinion, to let the use of the Free Trade Hall on that day slip out of their hands. He then devoted his address to the consideration of the universal unrest with regard to religion, especially among young men, and the part which the Sunday-school and the reasonable teaching of Unitarianism ought to play in counteracting the evil. He threw out the suggestion that if only that Union could find a way of gathering teachers together periodically to work out a consecutive course of religious lessons which they could afterwards give to their scholars, it would be doing a greater service than ever it had done before. The Rev. T. P. Spedding gave an address on "Seeking after a New Thing." He referred to the tendency of a great bulk of modern literature to advocate new things, to elaborate Utopian schemes. He was not out of sympathy with the new things; but he wanted to show the undesirability of losing sympathy with the old things altogether. In the seeking after new things it might seem that man thought he had taken the place of God, and it was the duty of the Sunday-school teacher, amongst others, to bring him back into his right position. He believed that the Sunday-school was the most valuable of any individual agency in this country, and that it accounted for, more than anything else, the Englishman's character. The Sunday-school work possibly involved greater sacrifice than other similar agencies; but that was all the more reason why it should not be neglected. The teaching of true religious citizenship could not be begun too early. They might have only antiquated buildings and books without backs; they might have teachers who quaked in the presence of respectable-looking scholars lest they should ask them puzzling questions; but all difficulties became minimised when teachers had hearts, and prayed for strength in the work they had in hand. They only needed to fear when they began to teach science and to compete with the technical schools. Before science, literature, or biography there should come first experience out of their own book of life. The finest thing was for a teacher to set himself to win the affection of his scholars, and make them want to be like him. Let people talk as they will about new ways of running the Sunday-school—there was plenty of knowledge, but never too many good lives in the world. The good teacher will find himself fully occupied in keeping his scholars free from the bad influences with which they come into contact during the week, and his influence over them will be proportionate to the purity and goodness of his own life. To what extent were they faithful to the leaders of old? Upon the man who displaced the idea of God rested the responsibility of introducing something which should make men not only good, but better than those influenced by religion. It was easy for young men to call themselves rationalists; but they did not find the average young man of that class doing much to touch the real evils of life, in the same spirit as their forefathers did. He referred to the bad language, betting, and drinking to be found amongst the young. The spirit of self-sacrifice was lacking amongst them; while their pleasures tended more and more to brutality and selfishness; and these facts made him believe that it was rather by the methods of their forefathers, and not by any new panacea, that things could be improved. Mr. J. Wigley was elected president for the ensuing year, and Mr. H. Woodhead and Mr. F. Golland were re-elected treasurer and secretary, respectively. The Longsight Free Christian Church Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. O. H. Heys, rendered an excellent programme of part-songs and glees, and gave another proof that they are the most efficient amateur choir connected with our Manchester Unitarian congregations.

Mossley.—On Sunday the Chapel Anniversary services were conducted morning and evening by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle, and in the afternoon by the Rev. T. R. Elliott. In the afternoon a cantata was sung by the choir, and an address given by the minister. The collections amounted to £31.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—On Saturday, October 31, the annual meeting was held in Percy-street Chapel, Preston. At three o'clock a service was held, conducted by the Rev. A. Doel, of Chorley; preacher, the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster. After tea the public meeting was held in the church, the Rev. Herbert V. Mills presiding. The annual report, showing the progress of the Association, was approved, and the treasurer's statement, showing a balance in hand of £8 12s. 9d., was highly satisfactory. The officers were re-elected. The president afterwards in his address gave the outlines of the new interchanging library scheme connected with the schools in the Association. At the conclusion of the meeting, in the school, the Preston friends gave a delightful rendering of the opera "Phyllis," by R. W. Root, which was greatly enjoyed by the visitors.

Newark (Presentation).—On Thursday week, a meeting was held in the schoolroom of the Free Christian Church, to bid farewell to the Rev. E. R. Hodges, on his removal to Guildford. The chair was taken by Alderman Saunders, who said that during his eight years' residence in Newark, Mr. Hodges had made many friends. and their best wishes went with him and Mrs. Hodges to their new sphere of work. On behalf of the congregation and other friends he had pleasure in presenting to Mr. Hodges a purse of eighty guineas. Mr. J. C. Warren expressed a layman's sympathy with the minster's uphill work and self-sacrifice, and the Rev. E. I. Tripp and W. Lindey joined in the expressions of regard for Mr. Hodges. In responding and warmly acknowledging the gift, Mr. Hodges bore testimony to the help he had received from his wife in his ministerial work, and also to the chairman's loyalty to the Free Christian Church. He was hopeful as to the church's future. A vote of thanks to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

Pontypridd.—The Harvest Festival services were held at the Vestry Hall on Sunday, October 25, the Rev. D. J. Willams, of Merthyr, being the preacher. At the evening service there was not a seat vacant. On Thursday, October 22, a social tea meeting was held, which was well attended and much enjoyed.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., entered on his ministry at Upper Chapel on Sunday week, and on the following Wednesday evening a welcome meeting to Mr. and Mrs. Street was held in the Channing Hall. The Master Cutler, Mr. M. J. Hunter, presided, and among those present were the ex-Master Cutler, Mr. A. J. Hobson, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, president of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union; Messrs. J. P. Thomasson and T. Harwood, of Bolton; the Revs. James C. Street, C. Hargrove, Iden Payne, A. H. Dolphin, and W. Stephens. The chairman and Mr. Hobson offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Street, on behalf of the congregation, the latter recalling the history of Upper Chapel from its foundation, two hundred years ago, and dwelling on his own early recollections of Dr. Brooke Herford's ministry there. Among others who joined in the welcome was the Rev. W. Blackshaw, who represented the other Nonconformist ministers of the town. Mr. Street warmly acknowledged the welcome he and Mrs. Street had received.

Southern Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meeting of this association was held at High-street Chapel, Portsmouth. At the meeting of the executive held in the afternoon, Rev. C. C. Coe (of Bournemouth) presided, and at the public meeting held in the evening, the chair was taken by Mr. H. Blessley, in the unavoidable absence through illness of Mr. G. Cosens Prior. The chariman, after extending a hearty greeting to the various friends from a distance, went on to speak of the influence exercised by Unitarians on the churches around and on the active participation of the members of our little congregations in various fields of public life. Rev. C. C. Coe, speaking on the present duty of Unitarians, pointed out that in practical piety, and the building up of churches reverent and free in spirit and deeply imbued with truly religious zeal and helpfulness, lay their best hope of commending our faith to those outside all faiths. The meeting was also addressed by Rev. E. J. Wilkins, after which the following resolution was moved by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. F. G. Pinnock, and supported in a vigorous speech from Mr. Cromwell Prior, and unanimously agreed to:—"That we, as loyal English men and women, remembeing that our country was one of the principal signatory powers at the Berlin Congress twenty-five years ago, and that, therefore, England is directly responsible for the long continued misrule of Turkey in the Balkan States, we would now earnestly call upon His Majesty's Government to endeavour at once to stop the Macedonian massacres in accordance with the terms of the Berlin Treaty, and that this meeting would desire to place on record and to convey its conviction to His Majesty's Government that the direct rule of the Sultan should cease in Macedonia and the neighbouring provinces." During the evening meeting the anthem "As Pants the Hart" was well rendered by the choir, assisted by several of the scholars from the Sunday-school and from the John Pound's Training Home. A very pleasing departure from the usual custom was also made by the filling up of what is often the awkward interval between tea and the evening meeting by a short entertainment in the upper schoolroom, when a programme of action songs, &c., were rendered by the elder scholars of the Sunday-school and the girls from the John Pound's Institute, whose training reflected the greatest credit on their friends and helpers, Mrs. Prior, Mrs. Rogers, and Mrs. Matthews.

In this book an attempt has been made to get nearer to the meaning of the original by omitting some passages now held by many students to be interpolations, and also by first comparing several translations in order to select that word or phrase which seemed to convey the truest sense. It is hoped that by this means the great beauty, and wonderful teaching of this ancient masterpiece may be brought more clearly before the notice of the general reader.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and Sunday School Association, held in Manchester this week, were full of interest and encouragement. Our report is not completed this week, but there is enough in the record, we trust, to give a decided impetus to the collections of to-morrow, which is Association Sunday.

OF the 28 mayors of London boroughs elected on Monday, 14 are recorded as Liberals, 13 as Conservatives, and one as Independent. Among the Liberals is the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, minister of the Plumstead Unitarian Church, who has been elected Mayor of Woolwich. We congratulate Mr. Jones on the honour thus conferred upon him and his church. At the same time we trust that his congregation will realise the grave responsibility thus laid upon them amply to sustain the ministry of their church in all its activities while their leader is engaged in the arduous and responsible service of his borough.

It is a great pleasure to us also to congratulate Mr. Arthur Currer Briggs on his election as Lord Mayor of Leeds.

A LARGE and enthusiastic audience filled the Botanical Theatre, University College, on Thursday week, at the opening lecture of the Rev. Stopford Brooke's new course on "Shakespeare's Plays." Mr. Sidney Lee, the Shakespeare biographer, who occupied the chair, introduced the lecturer as a true missionary of empire—the empire of literature—and referred in felicitous terms to his many services to art and letters. Mr. Brooke, whose rising was greeted with warm welcome, stated that he would himself have preferred to continue his studies of modern poets, but at the committee's request he would deal with some of Shakespeare's plays. He should treat them as works of art, and not in the critical, textual manner of a text-book. As such, the plays were not ethical or philosophical in purpose, and had no direct intention of enforcing lessons. This would would have interfered with his treatment of life. Shakespeare was an artist, not a teacher or prophet; but art contains morality. His work was marked throughout by true sanity of judgment and by wide sympathy with life in all its varied play; and it got down to the working man. The play taken for consideration was "The Midsummer Night's Dream."

So the Bethesda men have given way at last! It has been a brave struggle, and it would be a mistake indeed to assume that it has been fruitless. Popular belief in the justice of the untaxed private ownership of the mineral wealth of the country has been shaken past recovery by the spectacle of a community, which had for generations found subsistence by delving wealth from Mother Earth, suddenly deprived of their livelihood, without appeal, by the will of a single man. But the fight has borne fruit more directly useful to the quarrymen themselves in the new co-operative quarries started in their interest by the money of sympathisers all over the country. The men have not, as it was hoped, been able to maintain their resistance till the new quarries were ready to give employment to all who could not find work elsewhere. But the development of the quarries will continue, and they will offer a permanent alternative to service with Lord Penrhyn, and so destroy the monopoly which has hitherto been his most powerful weapon in bending his employees to his will. The men's defeat is only for a time. Victory, local and national, will come yet.

A CONFERENCE of ministers and representatives of the Free Churches of London has been held at the City Temple to consider the question of the unemployed. The conference was convened by the Christian Social Brotherhood, and presided over by the Rev. R. J. Campbell. There were several visitors present, including Sir John Gorst, M.P., and Sir John McDougall. The problem of unemployment, which has been less pressing for several years, became very serious last winter; and there are many indications that the conditions will be even worse this season. According to the latest Board of Trade returns, those for September, the percentage of unemployed members of Trades Unions is higher than it has been at the same period of any recent year. If the percentage for the whole country is as high as that of the skilled trades, and it is probably higher, there are not less than 750,000 now out of work. People who know the homes of the poor notice that there has been less than the usual ability this summer to redeem things put into pawn last winter, and consequently there will be less ability in the coming months to tide over a bad time by this resource.

IT was felt by those who arranged for the holding of this conference that it is of the utmost importance to give a timely consideration to this problem. Should we have a long spell of hard weather the cry of exceptional distress will certainly be heard; it will as certainly be responded to by the hasty raising of relief funds. We shall again see the dolorous processions of the unemployed in the streets. All schools of social thinkers and workers are agreed that there is no constructive efficacy in all this apparatus of promiscuous charity. It is rather to be regarded as twice harmful, harmful to those who give and those who take. There is an alternative, difficult to carry out, but efficacious for those large numbers of men and women who do not want alms and who are able and willing to work. The first resolution, adopted unanimously by the conference, was directed to this point, and is along the lines of the resolution passed in February at the Guildhall Conference of local authorities and representatives of Trade Union and other labour organisations. It is as follows:—

That this Conference, representing the Free Churches of London, believing it to be one of the prime duties of the nation to see that no man willing to work shall be without the opportunity, urges upon the Government the constitution of a department presided over by a Minister of Industry, part of whose functions shall be to gather and disseminate industrial statistics, to watch for and notify indications of approaching periods of dearth of employment, to help in distributing labour where it is most needed, and above all to promote measures whereby the unemployed labour of the nation may be utilised, both temporarily and permanently, alike by the Government and the local authorities.

A SECOND resolution, which was also unanimously passed, urges the members of the churches to raise a fund not for the giving of doles but for finding work:—

That in order to discriminate between the unemployed who are willing to work and those who are not, a fund be created and maintained by the Free Churches in London for the purpose of procuring waste land which can be increased in value by ordinary labour, on which applicants may be set to work at fair current wages, and for any other purpose of a similar nature that may be decided upon; that a committee of ten members representing the Free Churches and five members representing the Christian Social Brotherhood be elected to administer the fund, the committee to have power to add to their number, and that the committee furnish a periodical report to the churches and persons contributing to the fund.

The significance of the conference lies chiefly in the fact that a representative gathering of members of the churches has recorded the opinion that it is time to substitute for a slight and casual philanthropy of giving a serious attempt to deal with the causes of poverty; that it is possible in a large measure to prevent distress, and that this is better than to relieve it; that religious people in their personal and corporate capacity ought to concern themselves in the attempt to provide the means of honourable support to all who are willing to work. When this is done it will become more possible than it is at present to deal with other classes of the poor, those who by vice or the misfortune of long periods of unemployment are so far degenerated that they prefer idleness to labour. What is needed is the power to discriminate between those who want to work and those who are either unable or unwilling to so.

THE National Union of Women Workers fills a distinctive place in the public life of women in this country. Its very existence is an education, for it is non-political and undenominational. Nearly all the members of the Union are keenly interested in both political and religious subjects, as well as in those dealt with at the various conferences. But they are agreed to seek the good of working together at the thing which unites, keeping in abeyance for the time being the thing which divides. In these islands civilisation is advancing, in spite of the rigid organisation of the churches and the lethargy of the State. Public opinion is moving forward, though it may be only very slowly, towards the ideal on many questions. Some of these are not yet ripe for legislation, others have outgrown the legislation upon them, others still had better never be brought before Parliament, but will best be solved by the force of a righteous public opinion alone. In the case of all such questions we depend in this country almost entirely upon voluntary thought, research, effort, and organisation for their most effective treatment. Such questions include the necessary modification of the Poor Laws, public sanitation, especially in rural districts, the administration of charitable relief, the housing of the poor, the employment of barmaids, moral education, the care and rescue of girls and women. It is for the elucidation of all such questions and many other kindred ones, to bring them to the front, to get patient workers who shall put existing laws in operation—in its own words, "to focus and redistribute information, ... and to promote the social, civil, moral, and religious welfare of women" that the Union exists.

THE National Council of Women of Great Britain and Ireland, which is the governing body of the National Union of Women Workers, met on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of last week, in Cheltenham and Gloucester. The opening session was held at the former place, in the beautiful Princess Hall of the Ladies' College. The annual report spoke of thirty-seven branches in Great Britain and Ireland. But, in addition, various women's societies, to the number of a hundred and fifty, whose work correlates in a greater or less degree the work of the National Union, send representatives to the Council. This, in turn, is federated to the International Council of Women, which meets once in five years in one or other of the great cities of the world. And so, as in the case of the women's temperance societies, another chain is "wound every way" about the world for the weal of all.

LADY BATTERSEA presided on Wednesday morning over a full attendance in the new and lightsome hall named from the Princess Royal—the late Empress Frederick. Arising out of the report, an animated discussion took place on the barmaid question. The difficulty of legislating for grown-up women against their choice of a livelihood was urged; and, on the other hand, the terrible conditions of temptation, long hours, and want of proper accommodation were adduced. At a later hour, a resolution condemning the occupation as unfit for women was carried with four dissentients. A paper on "Housing" stated, with the approval of the audience, that the question was an Imperial one. There were no fortunes, no excitement, no politics in it, but there was something better than all these—Christianity was in it. The seduction of English girls to Continental towns, for vicious purposes, by means of bogus registry offices, was dwelt upon, and it was deplored that Government was so slow in taking action. We are behind other European countries in our care of our girls, who, in their ignorance or unfriended condition, are decoyed abroad to their ruin. The need for Secondary Education and for freedom in educational experiments received much attention, and, speaking to a suggestion that Evening Continuation Schools should be free, it was remarked that it need no more pauperise boys or girls to get free education in the people's schools than it pauperised the bishops to get theirs out of endowments stolen from the poor.

THE November number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon on "Temperance Reform," preached on the occasion of the Jubilee of the United Kingdom Alliance. Our Temperance Societies would do a good work if they obtained copies of this sermon for distribution among thoughtful people. (Copies, 1d. each, may be had from Mr. C. Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds.) The sermon, after noting the temperance legislation of the last fifty years, and how, in spite of the fierce opposition at each step, no reasonable man would wish now to go back upon it, points out how much there is yet to be done. The Registrar-General's returns for 1901 showed that 1,778 males and 1,353 females died directly from the effects of alcoholism, but that the leading medical paper says, is but a small proportion of those whose death was really due to excessive drinking. Ten times as many there must have been, for whose death the medical certificate gave some other cause, and yet directly or indirectly they could be traced to drink. And so Mr. Hargrove adds:—

> Say that 30,000 deaths were due to drink, and diseases caused by drink, in a single year. Well, even that number would not be so terrible a loss out of a population of 40 millions. A drunkard's life is a curse to the community; and if so many were removed by quick poison we might deplore their fate without regretting them. But think what is implied in these figures—how every single one of these 30,000, before he or she came to his end, wrought shame and misery all around. Think of the homes lost in dirt, the children hungry and neglected, the wives broken-hearted, the husbands desperate even to the verge of crime, the ruin brought on happy households. Oh! if these deaths could have been by some more merciful poison, by arsenic or strychnine, which would have done their work speedily and only at the patient's cost! But this most cruel poison—poison certainly to them, whatever we may think of its use in moderate doses—this is so slow in its action, so insidious in commending itself, so destructive to soul as well as body in its working, so wide-spreading beyond the immediate victims in the ruin it effects! There is no agency of evil among us half so effective. It wastes resources, it destroys the natural affections which even the beasts share with us, it covers its victims and all that belong to them with shame, it blights every prospect of good, it produces misery incalculable, it fills jails and asylums and workhouses. "The consequences of the vice" of intoxication are so many and so fearful that it is difficult to enumerate even the outlines of them; and to pursue them in all their melancholy details would require a volume." These are not the words of "a rabid teetotaler," but of a report of the Parliament of Great Britain before teetotalism was known. Oh, said I not, and rightly, that death—death too long deferred—is the least of all the wrong which alcohol does to our race?

The text of the sermon is, "Thy Kingdom come," and it shows with a force which it is difficult to resist, how the sincere utterance of that prayer by the people of this country must include a determined grappling with the evils of intemperance.

FOLLOWING on the announcement of the Treaty of Arbitration between France and England, there are rumours of similar agreements between other Continental nations. Reuter's Boston correspondent sends the news that a non-partisan conference is to be held shortly in New York to discuss the question of an Anglo-American treaty. Mr. Thomas Barclay, who did so much to further the goodwill between England and France, especially through the various Chambers of Commerce, is reported to be arranging the details of the proposed conference, and it is stated that President Roosevelt and Mr. Hay have given assurance of their interest in the matter. We trust that these are signs of a better understanding among the nations, and a step forward towards the "federation of the world."

MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS.

VII.

I AM glad that Mr. Barrow has drawn attention in his most interesting paper to the recurring difficulties and the continuing responsibilities of Domestic Mission work. I should like to say that while I agree in the main with his description of missionary aims, and with some of his criticism on missionary methods, I find myself at issue with him in what I conceive to be the main trend of his argument.

He seems to me to advocate greater differentiation in method between the work of an ordinary church and that of a mission. He says:—"There is little now to mark off our mission stations from churches of the ordinary type." "A Mission Church must in time suffer as all churches suffer from its own respectability." "It is of the essence of a mission that it should frequently change its ground." Differentiation in method is also recommended in the separation of social from religious work, the severance of any connection between spiritual ministration and charitable distribution, &c.; and in a fine passage he points out that the root question which comes before every missionary, the salvation of the outcast and the criminal, demands very special capacities.

Now there can be, I should think, very little doubt in the minds of most of us that various activities of the character indicated in Mr. Barrow's paper, and comprised in what we understand as missionary work, require differing gifts and capacities, and would often be carried on with advantage by different persons. But I fail to see in this the necessity for separate and special societies, missions, agencies, or settlements, each devoting its energies to some particular portion of the work, which, if not specifically stated, is certainly indicated in Mr. Barrow's paper.

I hope I may be allowed to quote Professor Henry Jones on a widely different subject in the current Hibbert Journal: "Instead of a theory of their mutual exclusion, I should proffer a theory of their mutual inclusion."

Have we not in the conception of a Christian church the power and potency sufficient to accomplish all the missionary aims we feel incumbent upon us to-day, and also the ability to use the various methods necessary for the accomplishment of these aims?

"In what sense," Mr. Barrow asks, "can a selfgoverning congregation remain, and be described as a mission?"

If a mission is a place where missionary work is carried on, or from which it proceeds, or, if it expresses the self-consecration of individual souls conscious of some work to do for others, then the answer to Mr. Barrow's question is, that the self-governing congregation, which cannot be described as a mission, whatever else it may be, is not a Christian church, and is, so far as any spiritual or religious growth may be concerned, a society which has cut off from itself its own conditions of life.

Mr. Barrow's paper is full of evidence of this identity of aim of church and mission. "The church in the house is, after all, the main thing." "How much might be done by families grouped together and pledged one to another to live by rule and plan."

Here are the foundation principles of a Christian church, without which it could hardly be said to have any worthy existence. A church which confines its activities to public worship on one day in a week, whose members know nothing of each other, and join in no common activities is a spiritual furnace without fuel or fire.

In one point I differ entirely from Mr. Barrow. He urges that the social worker, who deals with poverty and ignorance and gloom, whose work, he says, is beyond all praise, if he connect his social work with distinctly religious motives, and distinctly religious methods, does that "which is more than likely to narrow the social usefulness," since "one branch of the work will hamper and prejudice the other."

What is the motive, then, which prompts the majority of the social workers, whose work, says Mr. Barrow, is beyond praise? Is it not, in the great majority of cases, a religious motive, and religious enthusiasm, and will not this religious motive and enthusiasm be more likely to purify the ideals and methods of the social workers, to keep them free from lower aims, and tend not only to elevate the workers, but those among whom they minister?

It may well be that the future mission will be more of an undenominational settlement rather than a denominational mission. On that basis, indeed, our spiritual ancestors founded the Domestic Missions, and their charter remains unbroken to this day. But is not the same great ideal also that of the Unitarian or Free Christian communities? Is it denominationalism that they stand for? Is it not rather for the universal religion without boundary walls or creed divisions, which seeks the love of God through the love of man? I conclude, therefore, by saying that I look for the time when every mission will be a church, because every church will be a mission.

May our little community of churches be the first to show the way.

RICHARD ROBINSON.

VIII.

ONE is allured at first by the fascinating sense imparted by Mr. Barrow's remarkable paper, that religion could, by the methods he earnestly propounds, be put above suspicion. But after the first glamour of this fascinating prospect has passed away, one remembers and stolidly accepts the position that it is the sad prerogative of religion to be always under suspicion. And one may say in passing that a careful reference to the closing volumes of Mr. Charles Booth's great work amply shows that even the Institutions which are to be "the channels" for the distribution of "charity" are by no means exempt from suspicion of one kind or another. And these institutions, one and all, arose under the inspiration of religion in the first place. The fierce light that beats upon the motives of religion and of her offspring may act largely as the safeguard of their purity. Religion cannot always be trusted, it would seem, to take prudence and common-sense for her companions; and certain it is that, when she passes the door of the Charity Organisation Society or of some kindred institution, she persuades her staid companions to enter there, and as soon as they have disappeared, she hurriedly escapes and gives them the go-by. She wants sometimes to be alone and free to "believe all things" of the worst, and to "bear all things" for the worst. When as yet there were no institutions claiming to be the fit and proper channels for the distribution of charity, she had not been a wholly untrustworthy channel. And where religion has been deluded into the temptation to increase her followers by a mistaken distribution of alms, she has been the first "to repent her of the evil," and nothing is more certain than that this evil defeats itself most manifestly. The beautiful picture Mr. Barrow recalls to our minds of the purseless missionary requires a companion picture to complete it. "The modern missionary," says Mr. Barrow, "like the old, must learn to take no money in his purse." Very well, then, that will relieve the "benevolent fraternity of churches" (to use Channing's felicitous expression) from raising funds for either mission work or mission workers, for these workers will depend for their sustenance on what they will get from the houses in the slums where they do not need to shake off the dust of their feet. The labourer is worthy of his hire. Would the hire of the "unsteady mortals," whom Mr. Barrow elsewhere alludes to, sustain even an emaciated St. Francis? And, supposing that the fruits of repentance were soon visible, so that the missionary could keep soul and body together, would not "the suspicious" change the object of their suspicion from the "ministered unto" to the minister? Mr. Barrow offers us the judgment of an "unsteady mortal" to persuade us to go and live in a whisky and filth-reeking court. What is the judgment? This, namely, that if we went and lived there, we should want whisky too. Mr. Barrow knows that we should want nothing of the kind, and he also knows that the "unsteady mortal" has plenty of neighbours, and some in his own court, who don't take to whisky, even in spite of the alluring example offered them by the "unsteady mortal" himself. They show him how not to do it. Would he be more likely to mend his ways, if one came to live near him from quite another world, not necessarily from "the dead," to tell him of the fiery consequences? No missionary fears danger or the risks of disease. He is in the midst of them most of the day, and all the days of the week, and many a good man and true of all denominations who did not live on the spot has succumbed. The strongest characteristic of "unsteady mortals" is their weakness for preaching to "clerical visitors," and the strongest characteristic of steady clerical visitors is to answer a fool according to his folly. One more word—one's canvas is too limited to do justice to so fine an utterance as this undoubtedly is of Mr. Barrow's, and one trusts that its illumination will not be dimmed by our attempt to trim the wick even with clumsy fingers—I cannot, however, refrain from saying that I cannot see a shred of "respectability" in the "head" of that "respectable family," who found it (in the course of a single year) "more profitable not to allow himself to recover" and work. If the Rochester Diocesan Conference's special committee could not find a healthier "corpus vile" than this, they are to be condoled with, but this is too malodorous to serve any useful purpose. The word "respectable" has indeed been battered about till one is almost ashamed of trying to be respectable. I shall never forget the gleam of indignation in Dr. Martineau's eye, years ago, in a debating society, when he turned upon us and exclaimed, "is it criminal then to be respectable?" If we had only had the Rochester special committee at our elbow, we could have turned the tables on him.

IX.

SEVERAL of your correspondents have covered the whole field. Let me take up one or two points, and even here I can only hint abruptly at the thought I have. In the first place, I think our Domestic Missions are almost ideal institutions for touching, lifting, and refining the physical, mental, moral, and religious life of the young working people of our cities, just at the testing time of growth—that period of adolescence when a man is made or marred. Some teachers and preachers are not so ready to draw the rigid line of demarcation between sacred and secular as the rest of the world; and, to many, a roomful of clean-bodied, healthy-minded youngsters is as inspiring as a crowd of communicants may be to others. Tone tells, and the purpose of rectitude must never be disregarded. What we call "religion" is meant to lift pleasure and recreation, among other gifts of life, into a higher plane, a sweeter atmosphere; and cultured people who are doing this in a spirit of good-fellowship and sympathy are preaching better practical sermons than the revivalist who yearns for the cataclysm of sudden conversion. Again, it is a revelation of poetry in practice to see a city girl in a country lane lost in wonder as an enthusiastic botanist, such as our good Robinson, tenderly and humorously opens out the miracle of a buttercup. "Sermons in stones" is often quoted, and a return to Shakespeare, to nature and directness is never without result, whether you like to call Shakespeare, stones and trees sacred or secular. Nature is careless about names, and the "myriad-minded" is above them. Give me a good, strong-souled man or woman, and I do not care what his or her matter or method may be; the influence is bound to be of the right sort, whether he or she teach dancing or calisthenics, the fairy stories of science, or attempt to utter the cry of the soul for God.

I honestly confess that I am puzzled with the sentence "Prevention is very well for the righteous." Is it not just a little ambiguous? Prevention is simply the no-road to madness, and the righteous need more than that. No true man is ever satisfied by uttering "Thou shalt not" in stentorian tones, as a sergeant shouts "Halt!" in front of a brick wall; he adds to this a "right-about-face," and fills the imagination with the inspiration of divine possibility and the joy of existence. "It is a beautiful thing to be alive," and that man or woman is the best missionary who can equally abandon himself or herself in a good game of rounders, a romp, a book of rich delight, or the ecstasy of prayer. The road to the kingdom is covered with flowers. In its essence true service is adoration, true adoration service.

It is the same with all our giving, and the servant and friend of all must never be without a copper in his pocket—a bit of symbolism to show the wealth of his heart. A loaf of bread is sometimes better than a stereotyped benediction; not always, but sometimes, and we must not be unprepared for emergencies. Even the Central Relief Society is not altogether of the earth, earthy—particularly when you get good local committees of voluntary workers, such as we have in Liverpool. It is ever the man or woman behind the message, behind the gift, behind the recreation and the science. Spiritual and natural, natural and spiritual, there is perpetual interplay, and some of us cannot tear one from the other. I keep repeating "man or woman," and the "we" means both, because I am one of the few who heartily believes in lady missionaries. You have not space for me to give my reasons, which are the result of happy personal experience and sympathetic observation.

I believe in the man on the spot, particularly if he happens to possess one of those strong sanguine temperaments which can throw off all diseases incidental to humanity—with the help of a bath and a good cigar. Some men are so gifted that they never "take" anything that might upset their equilibrium; but others are so constituted and accommodating that a night or two in noisy or noisome quarters might be the means of sending them to a hospital for a month or two. You never know. A man must find this out for himself. Personally I should be delighted if I could be provided with a residence and allowed to turn my biggest room into a reception-room, club-room, ball-room, or tennis court—or whatsoever I thought fit.

J. L. HAIGH.

WE have quoted elsewhere from one of the articles in the November Unitarian World. A good part of this number is taken up by an article on "Gladstone and Liberal Religion," with quotations from Mr. Morley's Life of Gladstone. There is also an interesting article on "The Social Problem in India."

LADY WARWICK'S Agricultural College for Women has been removed from Reading to Studley Castle, Warwickshire, and has opened with forty-one students in residence. There will be accommodation for sixty. Instruction is given in the lighter branches of agriculture, such as dairy farming, horticulture, and market gardening. By raising the standard of efficiency in these branches of agriculture, own home-grown food supply will be increased, and a larger number of women will gain a livelihood in wholesome country employments.

BUDDHIST INDIA.*

IT was a happy thought to include in the well-known series entitled "The Story of the Nations," a delineation of India in the days of the rise of Buddhism. Every serious student of Indian history now knows the historical value of the early Buddhist literature. The first generations of the great Anglo-Indian scholars naturally accepted the views put before them by the Brahmin pandits, who were their guides through the colossal aggregates of the ancient sacred books. The famous law-book of Manu, for example, was placed by Sir William Jones about 1280 B.C. That date involved the view that the complicated system of caste divisions, the elaborate philosophy, the highly developed ritual, contained in this code, existed from a remote antiquity, and belonged to immemorial tradition. But no modern scholar maintains it any longer. On grounds of metrical form, and other peculiarities, Professor Max Müller long ago suggested that it was of much later origin, and had existed in an earlier prose form. The late Professor Cowell carried it down to the centuries immediately preceding or following our era. The lamented Bühler believed it to have been composed before 200 A.D.; Dr. Burnell, still unsatisfied, proposes the fourth century; and Professor Max Müller was prepared to see it brought to a period even later still. Now a book of law dealing with all kinds of social conditions, must reflect the circumstances of its own age. If one of the monuments of ancient Indian literature could thus be transposed fifteen hundred years, our knowledge of the social history of India must have been practically a blank. Imagine the chaos of European history if Solon or Justinian had been misplaced by a millennium and a half.

In the absence of trustworthy data for determining the period to which the different strata of Indian literature belonged, it was of the highest consequence to obtain, if possible, some fresh clues. These have come from two sources, which have helped to confirm each other. In the first place, from Ceylon, Turnour made known the existence of the early literature of Buddhism; and, thanks to the unwearied labours of Professor Rhys Davids, the Pali Text Society in the last five and twenty years has published nearly the whole of this great canonical collection. The sacred books received in Ceylon, Burma, and Siam, represent the earliest great literary deposit of Buddhist teaching. They contain materials of many kinds. There are the rules for the members of the order. There are reports of the colloquies of the Buddha, with kings and nobles, Brahmins and lay-folk, as the teacher travelled during his long life on his missionary journeys through the middle Ganges valley. And, above all, there is the earliest collection of folklore, in the shape of the 547 stories in the famous Jataka-book. This literature abounds with delineations of the social, political, and religious circumstances in which Buddhism grew up. It gives a very different picture of the place and power of Brahmanism from that which later tradition elaborated. Can it be dated? Is it possible to fix within reasonable limits the range of years, or even of centuries, in which these books were composed and brought together into the groups in which we now receive them?

The answer is found in the second of the two sources already specified. Scattered over a large part of India are the rocks and pillars on which the great Asoka engraved the remarkable edicts in which he expounded to his people the principles of his government. These are the first monuments of Indian imperialism, and their value for Indian history cannot be over-stated. Now, in one of his edicts, Asoka mentions five contemporary Greek princes, and his era, therefore, can be fixed with almost absolute precision in the middle of the third century B.C. But more than that; as a good Buddhist he commends to his subjects the study of some of the sections found in different parts of the Pali scriptures. Moreover, numbers of other inscriptions (of about the same age) have been discovered, containing allusions to the teaching, and to the names of the groups in which the books have been transmitted to us. And, lastly, on the decorated railings of some of the great Buddhist monuments of the third (or, at any rate, the second) century there are sculptured representations both of incidents in Buddhist history, and of familiar stories in the Jataka-book. Thus literary evidence is confirmed by monumental; the compilation of the Pali books which contain diverse materials, poetry and prose, monastic rules, moral teaching, popular tales, can be securely assigned to the two centuries before Asoka; while the Buddha himself was in the midst of his long career at the end of the sixth century, say 500 B.C.

To the study of this literature, it is well known, Professor Rhys Davids has devoted himself with immense patience and enthusiasm for the last quarter of a century. In the volume before us, he gathers up some of its results for the social history of that part of India in which Buddhism took its rise, and the territories afterwards brought within its influence. It is the work of a pioneer, and the author again and again warns us of its incompleteness. Moreover, the narrow limits of a volume containing only 332 pages, oblige him to omit some topics, and to deal briefly with others. Nevertheless, this book must at once take rank as the most valuable introduction to the study of Indian history which is yet available for the general reader. The fine scholarship of the author is evident on almost every page. He opens his subject with a discussion of the political position of the kings in the Ganges valley, and the distribution of the people in clans and nations. The village "social grades," with the beginnings of what afterwards grew to be caste-distinctions, and the town, then come under review. Of the great cities, Professor Rhys Davids gives a list of sixteen (the sites of some of them are still uncertain), and he is disposed to accept the traditions about the great size, for instance, of Benares or Pataliputta. That life in them was cheerful, and even joyous, may be inferred from the description (which Professor Rhys Davids has no room to cite) of the ten sounds with which they resounded: the sound of elephants, horses, and chariots; of the drum, the tabor, and the lute; of singing, of the cymbal and the gong; and finally, the summons "Eat, drink, and be merry." Very interesting is the chapter, based on the researches of Mrs. Rhys Davids, entitled "Economic Conditions," full of suggestive detail on methods of trade and manufacture. The great merchants gave letters of credit on one another; there were no banks; and interest (a little later) was at the rate of eighteen per cent.

Two chapters on writing, its beginnings and its development, lead up to the subject of literature. We cannot think that the problem of the origin of the Indian alphabet is to be solved quite so easily as the author suggests. Its connection with Semitic forms has been long recognised. In one of the slovenly sentences with which Professor Rhys Davids occasionally disfigures his clear and easy style, we are told that "a certain proportion of the oldest Indian letters are practically identical with letters on certain Assyrian weights, and on the so-called Mesa inscription of the seventh and sixth centuries B.C." (The Mesa inscription, by the way, belongs as is well known, to the first part of the ninth century.) But our author does not think it likely that the Indian alphabet was derived either from the Northern or from the Southern Semites; and he accordingly proposes to trace it "from that source from which these, in their turn, had been derived, from the pre-Semitic form of writing used in the Euphrates valley" (p. 114). Of such a pre-Semitic form of script, parent of the characters employed by Mesha in Moab (9th century), or Panammu, in the extreme north of Syria (eighth century), absolutely nothing is known. It cannot be traced in Mesopotamia; the Babylonians never made use of it in writing their own language; and its introduction as the palæographic original from which Syrian and Indian alphabets may be explained, seems hazardous in the extreme. The chapters on literature are full of valuable hints concerning the growth of the Buddhist sacred literature. We can here only express regret that the author has not been able to make complete comparisons with the Jain materials; and we earnestly hope that in another edition he may add an account of education.

The two chapters on religion contain much interesting material, but the subject is too vast to be condensed into such brief compass. There is a slight sketch of the wandering teachers who are contrasted with the professional Brahmins. The varied beliefs of the people are treated from the point of view of Animism, but there is no reference to the moral conceptions embodied in the doctrine of the Deed (Karma), which was the basis of the Jain and Buddhist interpretation of life, as well as the Brahmanical. Professor Rhys Davids justly pleads that in philosophical discussion there was a remarkable freedom of thought and expression. In this respect the denial of the theory of moral causation (embodied in the conception of Karma) by some of the Buddha's contemporaries, was a more radical negation than his own abandonment of the hypothesis of a soul. The book concludes with a rapid historical survey from Chandragupta to Kanishka. It is enriched with fifty-five attractive illustrations, taken largely from photographs of the monuments. A map of Asoka's empire is placed at the end: another is sorely needed to do justice to the geographical materials embodied in the opening chapters. In a future edition it may be hoped that some of the numerous misprints in Indian names may be avoided, and that the references may be more carefully arranged for the benefit of students who cannot always consult the Pali texts, or are unacquainted with the author's system of abbreviations. ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE publication of Mr. Morley's "Life of Gladstone" is an event not likely to be passed over in this month's reviews. In the Contemporary the place of honour is given to an article upon it by Mr. Augustine Birrell, while to the second number of the Independent Review Mr. G. W. E. Russell contributes an article of very warm appreciation, with some interesting personal reminiscences. In the Nineteenth Century and After Sir Wemyss Reid devotes a good part of his record of "Last Month" to the book, also adding something from his own memories. Speaking of the sincere religiousness which was the basis of Gladstone's life, Sir Wemyss tells of his visit to Leeds in 1881, and of a speech on the burning question of Ireland made at a great banquet.

> By arrangement he did not dine with the public company, but came in quietly when dinner was done, and took his seat by the side of the Chairman. He had hardly done so when he covered his face with his hands, and remained with his head bent for several minutes. The next evening I sat by Mrs. Gladstone at a private dinner-party, and she, naturally, was full of the many incidents of the visit. By and by, she said to me, "Did you see him, last night, when he came to the dinner-table, and he covered his face with his hands?" I said I had done so. "Well," she said, "he was praying. That was the most important speech of all, and he was anxious that he might do good, rather than harm, by what he was about to say." And then she added, "When we went to our bed-room last night, he said, 'My dear, if I were twenty years younger I should go to Ireland myself.'" It is a simple story, and perfectly true, as indeed no one who has read the Life will doubt.

The opening editorial article in the Independent Review is on "The Moral Issue," the moral issue of the great fiscal controversy. The ideal of a "self-supporting" community is condemned as utterly un-English; it is rather her interest and her mission to enlarge that commerce between the nations which makes peace and gives wealth. The system of Protection also involves the dangers of corruption of our political no less than our commercial life. So also in the Fortnightly, "Autonomos," writing on "Pinchbeck Protectionism," while admitting its theoretic charm to the professor in his study, adds:—

The difficulty of Protection is on the practical side; in its application, it involves either despotism or socialism, with intermediate stages of corruption.

This article should be carefully read. On the other hand, "Calchas," who follows, is an enthusiastic advocate of Mr. Chamberlain's ideal. In the same review Dr. Macnamara offers suggestions for an agreement of parties towards amendment of the Education Act in the new Parliament. Count Rusconi writes on the "Alfieri Centenary," and Mr. Chesterton on "The Political Poetry of Mr. William Watson," whom he honours as a typical Englishman, in whose poems may still be heard, "the old and authentic voice of the England of Milton and Wordsworth."

In the Monthly Review, Mr. Ralph Neville pleads the cause of "Garden Cities," with special reference to the prospects of the first city, the site of which has now been secured, some 4,000 acres, about thirty-five miles from London. As to Protection and its consequences, M. Yves Guyot writes pointedly on "Mr. Balfour's Economic Notes," his article in French following the English translation, and Mr. Winston Churchill follows with "Sheffield and its Shadow." With Mr. Karl Blind's article in the Nineteenth Century and After on "Macedonia and England's Policy," making light of the horrors there, with warm advocacy of the possibilities of the young Turks, should be read Dr. Dillon's terrible record in the Contemporary on "Macedonia and the Powers," dealing not with speculative politics, but with what he has lately seen in that unhappy land, and clearly demonstrating the infamy of the delay of effective intervention on the part of the Great Powers. Other articles of special interest in the Contemporary are Mrs. Fawcett's "Impressions of South Africa, 1901 and 1903," showing what is being done and what remains to be done towards the restoration of the desolated country, and, among other things, what great possibilities await an effective system of irrigation; and a first article by D. S. Cairns on "Christianity and the Modern World," showing how science, philosophy, and historical criticism unite to make a restatement of Christian truth inevitable, and when this has been done, how great a work awaits Christianity in securing a true development of national and international life, particularly in the relations of the dominant nations to dependent races throughout the world.

CHICAGO COMMON.

PROFESSOR GRAHAM TAYLOR is the head of the largest University Settlement in America, that of Chicago Common. He has been on a visit to Europe, and has been interested in seeing the Settlements in English towns. Like most folks who are busily engaged in some practical work for the solution of the social problem, he has a cheerful side to his nature, which is often uppermost, and his breezy American humour and vivacity carry things along with a swing.

American University Settlements trace their origin to the same source as those of England, and the name of Arnold Toynbee is honoured and revered by them as by us. But they are somewhat different in method, and their problem is not precisely the same. Professor Graham Taylor tells us that in Chicago twenty-five different languages are spoken, and that there was a time when ninety per cent. of the population had been born across the sea. Russians, Poles, Bohemians, Germans, Irish, Italians, and Norwegians, each form a city of their own within the city. In these circumstances the Settlement has to find some common ground for all, and one of its chief activities is the teaching of the English language to multitudes of almost every nation. Of course, there are queer folks, Anarchists among them, who find their way to the Settlement and are welcomed there, and are found to be not so bad after all. There are occasions on which everyone who cares to attend is "allowed to say anything he likes for just three minutes." "But then he must listen while other folks have their three minutes, and that is itself an education."

Professor Graham Taylor is not much attached to the term "settlement." He prefers "centre"; he says people "get away from the smoke of their own stacks," and they need to be brought back to a knowledge of the folks they left there, in a centre where all will "gather together in social equality," and "exchange values" freely. The result hoped for, and often attained, is "emancipation from class isolation and exclusiveness and prejudice," and the wealthy folks gain quite as much as any. Expressing these opinions in a recent public address, Mr. Taylor said, "There is a good deal of race-life thundering at your door for admission, and when you open, lo and behold, it lets you out into a larger world." In the course of the same address he referred to congested population, and said he had tried to get a definition of "congestion." A doctor gave him one he could not understand, so he just made one for himself. It is "having too much in one spot what ought to be all over you." He had also tried to get a definition of a settlement, and had heard several. One man had said "it was a place where you went to stay; and everybody thought you were better than you were."

There was good sense behind or in the middle of all Professor Graham Taylor's humour, and he told of the pioneer work undertaken by American settlements in the provision of baths, evening schools, care of children and of cripples, alleging that the municipal government of England undertook many branches of work which in America, owing to the corruption of such bodies, were neglected by them.

Because of the position gained at Chicago Common as a centre where all meet on an equality, its head is often called upon to arbitrate and adjudicate in trade disputes. He is also professor of sociology at Chicago University. When will English universities recognise that sociology needs to be thoroughly studied and taught? The object of a college education should be to give what will make a student of more worth to his fellow men and more worthy in himself. The idea was well expressed of a working man who wrote to Professor Graham Taylor's son when he went to Harvard, bidding him remember how others had to labour to provide for his needs while he was studying, and concluding, "Return in glorious light for all the oil that is being poured into your life."

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

THE second lecture of the course on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" was delivered on Monday evening, at Nottingham, before a substantially increased audience. It was estimated that 250 were present at the first lecture. There were at least 100 more on this occasion. This gives further assurance that the interest of the more thoughtful portion of the Nottingham public has been thoroughly aroused. Of those present more than one-half would be persons not associated with either of the local congregations. One encouraging incident was the request for additional "complimentary" tickets by orthodox theological students. The public is charged for admission 2s. 6d. for the course, or 6d. for each lecture. It is worth noting that these slight charges have not apparently affected the attendance except for good, by weeding out the indifferent.

The subject of the second lecture was "The Apocalyptic Christ." Mr. Carpenter began by reminding his audience of the note of the Baptist's preaching, "The Kingdom of God has come nigh." This was the cry taken up by the young prophet of Nazareth, and it constituted the first and main commission of his earliest disciples. They were charged to preach, not Jesus, but the gospel of the Kingdom. But when we examined what the preaching actually was a little later, we found that the message taken by Philip to Samaria, by Paul from Damascus to Rome, was a preaching of Jesus as Christ, a Christ who lived in the risen life, reserved in heaven, until he came again from the right hand of Power in clouds of glory to judge the quick and dead. The figure of "judgment" occupied a large place in the religions of the world. It is found impressively set forth in the ideas of immemorial Egypt—where the soul and its deeds are weighed in balances and judged. It was found too in the Persian religion, and doubtless these views had affected directly or indirectly the minds of the Hebrews. It appears in that well-defined class of literature to which Daniel, Enoch, Psalms of Solomon, Assumption of Moses, &c., belong. Usually God presides over the judgment, but sometimes the Messiah is introduced as an Assessor. The lecturer then described the apocalyptic and eschatological features of this literature, and showed how they had attached themselves to the conception of the Kingdom of God. When the Baptist announced that "The Kingdom of God is nigh," he at once put himself in line with this literature, and awakened a host of expectations associated with the Kingdom. What was meant by the Kingdom? There prevailed among some Israelites the external view, that Israel should again be restored as a supreme National Power. Some of the Rabbis held a more inward and spiritual conception.

To which party did Jesus belong? Words were attributed to him that naturally suggested an external view, as when he gives the sign of the last things and the coming of the Son of Man. But we had also other language from which it is clear that he spoke of the Kingdom as already come. In addition we had those parables of seed and growth in which the Kingdom was set forth as a progressive reality. As his ministry advanced he seemed more and more to throw himself on the divine aid to find comfort in the coming victorious power of the Son of Man, as for instance in his answer to the High Priest. The early Church understood the promise of a speedy second coming in the literal sense. But the second advent did not occur. What did Jesus mean? A serious school believes that the utterances of Jesus were misunderstood. Others, e.g., Professor Charles, admit that Jesus said these things, and that he was mistaken. The lecturer saw no escape from this conclusion unless by the "Son of Man" Jesus did not mean himself, but was using a well-known symbolic figure in an impersonal sense. This led to the discussion of the meaning of the term "Son of Man," and it was argued as at least quite possible that Jesus used the term, not to denote a person, but as the symbolic figure of an immense moral revolution. If so, then it could be held that it was the disciples who made the mistake of identifying their master with this symbol. Hence arose those expectations of the early Church, and its distinctive "prophetic" ministry.

The lecturer then gave an interesting account of the Book of Revelation as a book that belonged to the prophetic order but made up of various elements, Babylonian, Jewish, and the contributions of the Christian prophets who compiled it. Its denunciations referred to Rome, and its date was probably 96–100 A.D., when Trajan had taken the imperial throne after a great persecution of the Christians. In this book appeared a new doctrine, viz., that there would be a reign of 1,000 years before the general resurrection—a millennium in which only the saints would be associated with the triumph of Messiah while the rest of mankind awaited their judgment. This doctrine was never accepted by the Church as a whole, although it was common in the second century. It never found a place in the creeds; but the second coming and the judgment appeared, for instance, in the Te Deum and the Apostles' Creed.

Finally, Mr. Carpenter asked, what value had these hopes for us to-day? Our modern conception of the Universe as indefinitely extended in space and in time made it impossible for us to believe in the return of Jesus from a visible Heaven. These apocalyptic visions were possible to our imagination no more. Nevertheless they had their value as symbols. Judgment was still a reality: it was not a distant event but a perpetual process. The figures appeal to us no more, but the spiritual realities they express are still potent and true. God is not mocked. whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.

At Lewisham on Tuesday the attendance at the lecture was nearly fifty more than in the previous week, 70 per cent. of the audience being people who do not habitually attend the church services. For forty minutes after the lecture Mr. Carpenter replied to a number of searching questions.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

VII.—APPLICATIONS.

Matthew vii. 1–27.

JESUS had now told the "disciples" the whole secret of the New Commandment. He had explained the Higher Righteousness, the Higher Worship, the Higher Choice. All thatre mained to be done was to give certain rules and certain cautions. With these the Sermon comes to an end.

FAULT-FINDING.

First, they were not to let the knowledge of this secret make them ready to find fault. Knowing what other people did not know, they might be tempted to look down upon them, and to judge them too severely. Judge not, says the Teacher. As you judge, so will you be judged. Other persons have their faults, but so also have you, and their faults may be like little motes or splinters, and your own like large beams, or rafters. A speck, or splinter, in the eye is something that gives pain, and is something that the sufferer himself cannot see; you would like to remove it; do this, if you can, but first be sure that your own eye is clear, as well as quick. Think of your own failings. Make the best, and not the worst, of everything and everyone.

TRIFLING.

At the same time they were not to go to the other extreme. The secret was to be cherished, and told only to those who were willing to cherish it also. It was very simple, and yet very precious; they were to guard it as a holy possession, and never to treat it lightly. To do that would be like giving sacred offerings to dogs, or casting pearls before swine; the thoughtless would only misuse and despise that which they did not understand, and be ungrateful besides.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

After these two warnings as to what they were not to do, comes a positive rule about their future dealings with their fellow-men. They were to deal as they would like to be dealt with. We all know what we want for ourselves, and what we expect from others; and they know what they want for themselves, and what they expect from us. The rule is that we are to consider them, and study their interest, just as much as they are to consider us, and study our interest. This is sometimes called The Golden Rule, and in one sense so it is, but in another sense it is an Iron Rule, as we soon find, if we take it as it is, and try to apply it. A rule you must remember, is only a rule, and we are not a bit the better for it, because we make a motto of it, and hang it up as a picture on our walls, or turn it into a hymn, and set it to music, and sing about it. It must be taken to heart and practised. If this rule about doing as we would be done by were really carried out, the world in which we live would be utterly unlike what it is now. If you ever find the Golden Rule an easy rule to keep, you may be sure you are not keeping it.

APPEARANCES.

Then comes another caution. They were to be considerate, but they were not to be weak. They were to look at things steadily, and neither to think well of them, nor to think ill of them, until they had carefully examined them. They might very easily be deceived by looks, just as sheep might be taken in by a wolf dressed up as a sheep. There were false teachers in the world, who were not what they seemed to be. They were disguised. Not indented to know whether teaching was good or bad, they must do what they did with trees—look for the fruit under the leaves. Leaf and blossom would tell them nothing.

How necessary this caution is! We often think that we can see what is good, and what is not good, at a glance, but appearances are not to be trusted, one way or the other. Look for the fruit.

PROFESSIONS.

But nothing was so likely to deceive them, Jesus went on to say, as their own professions. Some day perhaps they would speak of him as Lord, and really love him, and call themselves his, and still be far from the kingdom of God. God's kingdom could only be entered by those who did His will in very deed.

Do we not all know, in home life, how little affection is worth without obedience? As it is at home, so it is in God's family. "He is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed."

FOUNDATIONS.

They had got down now to the very ground of the good life of the children of God—deeds. Beliefs were good, affections were good, words were good, but deeds must hold them all up. It may have been that from where they sat they could see the site of some house that had been built too near the sandy torrent-bed, and, built in fair weather, had stood for a time, and then had been swept away. A little way off was a house still standing, bedded in the rock beneath, hard to build, but stronger in the end than rain and flood and wind. What a picture, and what a contrast, they make—the wise man and the foolish man, the rock and the sand, the untouched walls and the scattered ruin! Who can fail to see what is meant? The foundations of the Christian life are the words of Christ, but the life itself, if it is to stand, must be the life of doing, not of hearing.

Two remarks before we leave the great Sermon. First, it is not the whole of Christ's teaching, and it is by no means the whole of Christianity. It was a first lesson for "disciples"; more sermons came afterwards, and these also you will study some day.

Next, the Sermon, great as it is, would have had little effect if the Teacher had not been that which he taught, had not himself done all that he asked others to do. Reading the story of his life, you read his own sermon again, in living characters.

STEWARDS OF A HERITAGE.

IN an eloquent passage of his sermon at the autumnal meeting of the British & Foreign Unitarian Association, reported in our present issue, the Rev. FRANK WALTERS reminded his hearers of the uselessness of organisation in church affairs without a driving force of intense conviction, and a consecrated spirit to set the machinery in motion and effect the purpose for which it is designed. The first chapter of the Book of Ezekiel furnished him with a striking image. The wheels of that machinery, he said, must glow like the mystic wheel in the prophet's vision; and there must be in our midst a new baptism of fire, with glowing enthusiasm, fire from heaven to kindle the sacrifice to be offered in our churches. So alone could the truth of the churches be vindicated, in the devotion of their love to God and man.

That such a fire is burning in the hearts of many of our people, with subdued intensity perhaps, but with very steadfast purpose, seeking for a fuller expression of its faith, was abundantly manifest in the course of the meetings. There was very little idle talk, and the real things of the religious life were those on which the stress was chiefly laid. How shall our churches maintain their position and meet the responsibilities laid upon them, how shall they enter upon a larger field and minister more worthily to the needs of the time—such were the questions earnestly faced, and not without new light thrown upon some of our most pressing problems. There was no vain boasting, but neither was there any note of despair or of feeble surrender in the face of serious difficulties.

The Unitarianism of which we heard was a broad spiritual faith, active in our churches, but not confined within any sectarian limits. Progress was one of its essential notes, progress towards a more perfect apprehension of the truth of GOD, and progress towards a fuller harmony with the growing life of man.

At the public meeting in the Free Trade Hall Mr. BOWIE gave an admirable account of the aims and operations of the British & Foreign Unitarian Association, telling of its many helpful activities in this country, for the strengthening of the life of the churches, the sending out of faithful messengers to the people, the dissemination of literature to meet the needs both of troubled thought and the heart and soul hungering for religious sympathy and guidance; telling also of its world-wide relations, and the response that comes from many lands to the reverent religious thought of Unitarian teachers.

Then came the Conference on Wednesday, with a variety of papers, each admirable in its way. The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, of Liverpool, having himself come through troubled waters to the strength and gladness of the new faith, and knowing how many have still to suffer for the lack of that clearer light and the fellowship of those who rejoice in it, made a strong plea that those who have the heritage of Unitarian faith should earnestly and persistently commend it to others; and later in the day the Rev. J. WORSLEY AUSTIN, Mr. JACKS's successor at the Church of the Messiah in Birmingham, offered the kindling thought of a great ideal, that of a world-wide Church of God, in the truest sense the "Holy Catholic Church," as constituents of which our own separate churches would gain a new dignity and loftiness of purpose, and impress upon our people a new seriousness in their own membership and a sense of a deeper responsibility for whole-hearted loyal service.

But the paper of most urgent practical importance for the welfare of our religious community was that of the Rev. CHARLES PEACH, who dealt with the problem of city churches, which the old congregations have largely deserted for the suburbs, and their duty to the people remaining behind. The suggestion that churches which can no longer maintain a minister, each one for itself, should be grouped under a superintendent minister, who should be responsible for the work, and enlist the services of lay preachers and other helpers, so as not to desert the people who would otherwise be left without ministrations and religious fellowship, we regard as of the highest value, and we trust that when next week we publish this paper it will receive the very earnest attention of the churches, and especially of the missionary associations, and others who have the management of funds for the strengthening of our common life.

Not in this paper alone was the fact emphasised that if our churches are adequately to meet the claims upon them they must realise the duty of religious ministry as laid not upon ministers alone, but upon the congregation as a whole, thus pointing to a larger employment of lay-preachers, and the active service of many others in a variety of helpful ways. It was a good omen for the future of our churches that this fact was brought so clearly into prominence at the Manchester meetings, and we trust that it will prove to have been only a first step in a serious concerted movement of advance on the part of churches adequately equipped and wisely led to the achievement of a great work of faith.

RELIGIOUS TEACHING IN SCHOOLS.

THE day on which the champions of denominational and undenominational education shall sit down at a round table to draw up a working compromise is still a long way off, and may indeed never arrive at all. But the premature and not very skilful attempt to bring about such a conference has naturally set men thinking and talking as to what they could concede and what they would regard as beyond concession if, and when, such a conference were brought about. And such discussion has not been without its immediate uses, inasmuch as it has tended to clear the issues, and has helped men to realise more clearly their character and their magnitude.

Thirty-three years ago a compromise was drawn up by which the managers of denominational schools were given aid from State funds to the extent of half their working expenses, so long as the education given was efficient, and were permitted, in consideration of their providing the remainder, to give instruction in accord with their denominational creed, and to choose the teachers by whom this instruction was to be given. That compromise has since been steadily undermined and now finally thrown over by the denominationalists, without the consent, and in face of the emphatic protests, of the other side, and without the sanction of the electorate, asked or received. The denominational schools now receive, to all effects and purposes, the same complete State support as the purely State schools established in 1870, and in any just settlement they can only avoid the natural corollary of complete State control by abandoning the State support they have seized upon. If that support is retained, let it be said once and for all, there can be no sort of injustice—no outrage upon conscience—in the abolition of all remaining distinctions between the two classes of schools and the final expulsion of denominationalism from our national system of elementary education.

It remains to be decided what the attitude of the State is to be towards the teaching of religion in the State schools, whether of School Board or denominational origin. And, first of all, it must be laid down as a principle from which there can be no departure, that the State cannot employ its appointed teachers to give instruction in the tenets of individual denominations, and that those teachers, in the words of Dr. HORTON'S reply to the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, "must be appointed by the public authority, without reference to denominational distinctions." That being so, the questions arise, (1) whether it shall give undenominational religious teaching, and, if so, of what kind, and (2) whether the State shall permit to others the use of its premises for the teaching of denominationalism to its pupils, and, if so, under what conditions.

Now if the world understood the phrase "undenominational religious teaching" in the sense in which it is understood by readers of the INQUIRER and illustrated by the teaching of our undenominational Domestic Missions, there would be very little difficulty in answering the first of these points (whch is all we can discuss this week). Who does not desire that the children of the nation, who are so soon to enter upon the control of her destinies, should be taught the love of God and man and the strength for all high ends which such love inspires? But experience has taught, alas! that on many lips undenominational religious education means simply education in the theology common to members only of a certain definite section of the Church of Christ. During these three decades of compromise and uncertainty those outside this definite section have acquiesced more or less readily in the State teaching of such theology—some because they believed that time and growing enlightenment would lead to broader views; some because they were impressed with the virtual impossibility of persuading their fellow Christians to appreciate their point of view; and some, again, on the other hand, because they found compensation in the countenance given to their differing theology in the State aided denominational schools.

But such acquiesrence in "undenominational evangelicalism" as a State taught religion cannot be counted upon when a settlement which is to be final is under consideration—a settlement, moreover, which eliminates the State aided denominational schools. Against an ideal "Board School religion" which taught only the theism and ethics of CHRIST and left the denominations a clear field in their own time and place to add their own theological superstructures, none of the denominations could logically raise objections. But "Board School religion" has not been of this character. Consciously or unconsciously, with or without the sanction, encouragement, or compulsion of their employers, the teachers have added a greater or less amount of their own or their employers' theological superstructure. It goes without saying that that superstructure has been directly inimical to the beliefs held by most readers of the INQUIRER. But Anglicans and Roman Catholics declare—and this is a point which cannot be ignored when a final settlement is under consideration, which is needlessly to offend no man's conscience—that this theological superstructure has been inimical to their beliefs as well. Evangelical Nonconformists may agree, justly or unjustly, that the contention is untrue. But the fact remains that the contention is put forward, and is put forward, in many cases, at least, with complete sincerity.

What is the inference? That, as discussion is at present tending, the State provision of religious education, given the material with which we have to work, is a thing enormously difficult to secure without injustices, real or imaginary, the infliction of which is not to be contemplated by persons of liberal mind. With our ideal of what unsectarian religious teaching should be the time has not perhaps yet come for liberal Christians finally to declare that it is impossible. But it is well at least to look the difficulties fully in the face, and to accustom our minds to the possibility of their proving finally insurmountable. But that is not to say that all will therefore be lost, as we shall endeavour on a future occasion to show.

THE November Seed Sower contains a sermon on "Thanksgiving" by the Rev. Henry Gow, and other helpful and interesting matter. Among his "Travel Impressions," the Rev. Joseph Wood tells of Plymouth Rock, where he met Robert Collyer (whom he insists on Doctoring), "who at four-score, with eye undimmed and natural force unabated, has solved the problem of keeping young." "With his snowy hair, great form, big genial heart, it was a benediction to sit at table with him and listen to his wise, kindly, optimistic talk." Then follows another impression:—

> The air of the White Mountains has the same exhilarating quality as the air of Switzerland's upper valleys. To breathe it is like drinking the wine of life. All things seem possible in that clear, sparkling atmosphere, and the dullest and most confirmed Pessimist finds that life takes on a more cheerful hue when all out-of-doors is quivering with vitality and inviting him to come forth and share the gladness of things. . . . Imagine a plateau about forty-five miles long by thirty broad, and 1,600 feet above the sea. From this plateau rise two groups of mountains, of which the eastern is known as the White Mountains and the Western as Franconia. The summits of the eastern group, some twenty in number, rise to 6,000 feet, and are named after various prominent Presidents of the United States. We looked out from the balcony of our hotel on Mounts Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and Washington. These mountains are divided by deep valleys, in which run numberless musical streams. The hill sides are covered with forests of pine and maple, while the golden-rod flourishes in every open space. It took the cobwebs out of the brain and the dinginess out of life to come into such close contact, day and night, with Nature in her large and noble moods.

I AM not ashamed to own my follies, but I am ashamed not to put an end to them.—Horace.

AUTUMN MEETINGS

OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association were held in Manchester on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday this week.

November weather in Manchester did not succeed in damping the ardour of the meetings, and there was abundant sunshine in friendly faces, and a warmth of hospitality such as we always confidently look for in the North. Mr. Arthur Sharpe, President of the Unitarian Association, was unfortunately prevented from attending the meetings as he had hoped, but his place was admirably filled at the conference on Wednesday morning and afternoon by two past presidents, Mr. David Martineau and Mr. William Long. The President of the Sunday School Association, Miss Marian Pritchard, attended the whole series of meetings, and both Associations were well represented, as were the churches of the Northern counties. A bookstall showing the publications of the two Associations was in charge of Mr. Garnett at the Lower Mosley-street Schools.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

Service was held in Cross-street Chapel on Tuesday afternoon, when a large and representative congregation gathered in the venerable building, well filling the body of the chapel, and the front of the gallery facing the preacher. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate, who read as lesson from the Fourth Gospel the narrative of Jesus and the Samaritan woman at the well. The anthem was "Hearken unto Me, My people," and the hymns, especially the last, "Pour, blessèd Gospel," were sung heartily by the great congregation.

The Rev. FRANK WALTERS, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, was the preacher. Taking as text 2 Cor. iv. 13, his special stress was on the words, "We also believe and therefore speak." The sermon was a forcible declaration of the great religious truths which the Association is pledged to maintain, those eternal things which ought to be the supreme interest of every living soul. They stood, he said, for religion, those eternal things which could never be swept away by the storms of time, immortal hopes that could never be conquered by the shocks of death, that sacred force which forever swayed the movements of humanity, and directed them towards some righteous goal. The secret force of an inevitable righteousness recognised by the early prophets flashed up in the consciousness of Jesus into a clear and marvellous intuition of the divine Father, of whose wisdom nature was the sacrament, of whose holiness and love man as child of God was to become the living shrine. Jesus was the latest of the long line of Hebrew seers, and went beyond them all in his teaching concerning the Father, who seeth in secret, the indwelling God, without whom they could do nothing. He brought a new consecration into human life, for in him men felt that humanity was lifted up to the level of God. He was the prophet of the Divine Fatherhood, the chief of faithful souls, who rallied the pilgrims of time towards the consummation of the ages, when even the son shall be made subject to the Father, that God may be all in all.

There was, the preacher said, a great human interest in the history of dogma. Their present task was not iconoclasm but reconstruction. He showed how the old dogmas of the creeds were being re-interpreted and universalised, to give truer expression to the Christian experience of to-day. Thus the dogma of the deity of Jesus was born again into the vast faith of the divinity of man, the union of humanity with God. And the doctrines of incarnation and atonement were adumbrations of the love of God. Calvary was the historical witness of all that love can do; the crown of thorns, the emblem of love's power; the cross of agony, the throne of love's final victory.

They had a special message to the masses of the people: to make the human Jesus known to them, whom they would hail as emancipator of the human soul, the leader of the cause of the people, who had for them the words of eternal life. In the great work of re-establishing the spiritual realities, the most inspired of their artists and writers were co-operating with them, and the latest results both of science and philosophy were on their side. The most recent utterances of science gave them a new conception of the world; they realised that matter could not be fully understood except as an element in the spiritual world. But they wanted more than science and philosophy and theology; they wanted Jesus, who translated supernal truths into a domestic idiom, which even a child could understand. He spoke of God, the Father, and man, the child, and of death as transition to some other resting-place in the Father's house. To declare those great truths was the mission of their Association. They formulated no final creed, but those things they believed with heart and soul, and, therefore, spoke them with unfaltering lips. If to-morrow a sublimer truth were revealed to them that also they would believe, and therefore speak.

They must seek for a new baptism of fire. The descent of the cloven tongues at Pentecost did not teach any new truth, it set the truth on fire; it discovered to the Apostles how to declare their faith so as to convert the world. So they must not regard their faith as a pietistic luxury, but be missionaries of the truth and labour with apostolic zeal. Machinery was needed, but thinking of it was sometimes apt to dim their zeal. Their machinery would accomplish nothing unless its wheels glowed like those in the vision of Ezekiel, unless they glowed and burned and moved under the impulse of intense spiritual power. All organisation schemes, anniversaries and conferences were but the building of the altar of stone, with the wood laid in order and the sacrifice prepared, and unless they learnt the mystic secret of calling down the heavenly flame, their labour would be lost. "The God that answereth by fire, let him be God." What they needed to inspire the truths of the intellect was the glowing impulse of a heart filled with love for God and man, a new baptism of fire, the fire of a vast enthusiasm and untiring zeal.

After the sermon a collection was made for the funds of the Association, and amounted to £13 17s. 4½d. At the close of the service tea was provided for a large company at the Lower Mosley-street Schools.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Free Trade Hall. The chair was taken by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who was supported on the platform by representative members of the two Associations and of the district, and by a large choir, which led the singing of the hymns. During the half hour before the meeting began an organ recital was given by Mr. O. H. Heys. The great hall was not half full, but there can hardly have been less than a thousand people present, and it was a fine audience for the speakers to address.

The CHAIRMAN, after the opening hymn, "City of God, how broad and far," offered a very hearty greeting to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association. The former, he said, had a long career of usefulness to look back upon. Founded in 1825, it united three earlier societies, one of which dated back to 1791. The Sunday School Association, though it had now attained to the ominous age of three score years and ten, was in its vigorous youth, and seemed to grow in energy with every added year.

Its publications were invaluable, not to their children alone, but for elder readers also. Both associations were doing a truly religious work, for the Unitarian Association was by no means confined in its operations to a theological propaganda. As Unitarians they recognised the solemn duty of honest and diligent search for truth, to establish their theology on true principles, thankfully receiving the messages of ancient lawgiver, psalmist, prophet, and above all the teaching and the life of Jesus, gratefully receiving also the teaching of science as to the divine laws of the universe around them. Reverently and humbly they recognised that God still spoke to the listening soul and called mankind into communion with Himself as directly and clearly as when Jesus walked in Palestine and in the old time before that. They must above all listen to that voice of God speaking to them, and strive to hold communion with that Holy Spirit, for even if they had the best theology it would be of little worth without true and heartfelt religious life.

In that meeting of the Association they were concerned not only with the propaganda of Unitarian theology, but with a true religious life and the progress of mankind. He recalled a motion he had made fifty years ago at a meeting of the Association on the subject of slavery, and the dismay it occasioned to some of his friends. At that time he believed that under the British flag colour prejudice had been done away with, and it was with humiliation that he found he could not make such an assertion at the present time. He protested earnestly against the exclusion of people from the colonies on account of colour, and against any form of forced labour. He trusted that as descendants of those who worked with Clarkson, Wilberforce, and Buxton they would strive for equal justice under their flag in whatever land. For the work of temperance he also added an earnest plea, that they should listen to the cry of the people at home as well as in distant lands, and by every means strive to overcome the evils they deplored.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS then gave an address on "The Blending of the Rational and Spiritual in Religion, Theology, and Life." The division of religious thinkers into two camps, he said, those of the mystics or spiritualists and the rationalists could no longer be maintained; the hour had come for blending or ending. The main cause of the severance had disappeared with the distinction between supernatural and natural, between miracle and order in the universe. The natural was now enlarged to include all that they had called supernatural. Angels and gutter-children, God and man, all were in the one great ordered universe, in which Thought was creation and Love was life. By the blending of the rational and the spiritual he meant the bringing of the spiritual universe, with its vast and subtle powers, into relation with ourselves. We must form an actual alliance with the spirit God and the spirit people. It was not a question merely of emotion, but of something real and intensely definite. That alliance was the basis of religion, the out-reaching of the personal self to the spirit God and the spirit people, it was a realised communion with the higher and larger life of the universe. Otherwise religion was like astronomy without the stars. So in theology, there was need for the same blending of the spiritual and the rational, especially in the interpretation of the Bible. The mere rationalist had better give up trying to explain the Bible; its key was that very thing from beginning to end, the blending of the seen and the unseen. The critics needed spiritual apprehension of the unseen realities to make their rationalism rational. Finally, in life there was need of the same blending, and it gave the right guidance in the whole range of duty, for man is a spiritual being, whatever his colour, and the whole significance of evolution is the development of the spiritual being from lower grades of animal life, the evolution of the child of God the Spirit.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was the next speaker. He began by a warm acknowledgment of the welcome they had received in Manchester, and the admirable arrangements made to secure the success of the meetings, and then spoke of the work of the Association, both in its national and international aspects. There was nothing narrow or sectarian, he said, in their methods of work, unless it were narrow and sectarian to urge on men the duty of searching after the truest and noblest religion they could find, and keeping the door open for any higher vision that might be in store for them. The Association was thoroughly democratic in its constitution. They had subscribers of a shilling, and he was thankful to say that they had one subscriber of £1,000 a year; but the man who subscribed 1s. had the same number of votes as the man who subscribed £1,000. They worked upon practical, helpful lines, and imposed no tests on the congregations which received their help, or on the preachers who delivered their message. Their work extended beyond the limits of the British Isles. They did not forget the Colonies, and, in thinking of the Colonies, they did not forget India. Wherever there was an earnest soul seeking for light and they had anything to give, they were ready to do so. They were trying in various ways to get into closer touch with those brave and noble, and often lonely and struggling souls in distant lands who were striving to unite perfect liberty with true religion. From Iceland and New Zealand, from the North-west provinces of India, from Tasmania and South Africa, from parts of Egypt even, and quite recently from the city of Jerusalem itself, there had come letters of inquiry about what Unitarians had to say on the great problems of human life and thought. Only a few weeks ago they had received the names of 300 graduates in the North-West of India who wanted copies of Mr. Armstrong's, "God and the Soul," and other works, to help in their seeking after religion in harmony with reason and conscience. Last year 100,000 pamphlets had been sent out to all parts of the world in response to applications, and thus they carried on the ministry of the printed word. Never before was the Unitarian name more widely known or more highly reverenced. That same spirit was in many of their churches, but he thought they did not sufficiently realise the greatness and importance of the mission God had assigned to them. In the midst of the turmoil of the religious world it was for them to bring light to seeking restless souls and to minister to the aspirations and the needs of simple men and women. They were faced by ignorance, superstition, and sin, and the great need, which they ought to supply, was of a noble, true, uplifting religious faith. That faith was concerned with the whole range of life. Their Unitarianism in the past had inspired a noble type of citizenship, and they must follow in the same line of faithful service. It was true that at present they were only in a small minority, but the future was with those who, with pure heart and open mind, sought to serve God in the service of their fellow men.

After the singing of another hymn, two more addresses followed.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON spoke on the subject of education. The Act of 1902, he declared, was passed not in the interests of education but to promote and extend the influence of denominationalism. They had a battle to fight against the animus and spirit of the Act. He had been no friend of the Compromise of 1870, and there must be no compromise now. They must demand the repeal of the Act, and use every constitutional means to effect their purpose. Much might be done by working the Act in accordance with their own principles, and they must fight the council elections to get the right men in. They must insist on effective popular control in place of the present unfair denominational representation on the boards of managers, and the tests applying to so large a number of the headmasterships must be done away with. He did not believe in the right of entry on the part of the denominations for sectarian teaching during school hours, nor did he believe that the parents desired dogmatic teaching for their children. The teachers should have the whole responsibility for all the teaching in the school, including that of practical religion. They as a people ought to be among the foremost in fighting the battle before which that Act must fall.

The Rev. JAMES C. STREET gave the closing address on "One Step Forward." He recalled memories of his work in Manchester forty years ago, when on leaving the Home Missionary Board he was appointed missionary to work in that district wherever he found an opening to speak his word. The fruits of that effort were seen in some of the churches at the present time. Conditions had changed since then, their authority was no longer sought in texts from the Bible, it was rooted in everlasting principles of life. New forces had come into play, and their Unitarianism had grown with the growth of the world. It had now become universalism and humanism, it overleapt the boundaries of Christendom itself, and was a religion adapted to the wants, capacities, and longings of all humanity. In that spirit their work must be done, and the step forward which he suggested to the Association was that, if they could find the men of the right capacity, with the gifts and the spirit demanded by such a work, they should give to them a free commission, such as he himself had received in the early days, and send them out to the people as the Apostles of old were sent, to find their own occasion and opportunity, to deliver that great message of unification, of love and fellowship. The fields were ripe unto harvest. Never had there been such an appeal as there was to-day for a great human, universal religion, and for men of grit and character and education to lead the way.

The hymn, "We limit not the truth of God," and the benediction brought the meeting to a close.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Wednesday morning, after a devotional service conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper in the hall of the Lower Mosley-street Schools, a Conference was held, the chair being taken by Mr. David Martineau, in the unavoidable absence of the President.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS read the first paper, on "The Propagation of our Unitarian Faith." In the course of an earnest appeal that those who knew the inestimable value of their free faith should not be content to keep it to themselves, but should use every means to share it with others, he quoted from the last report which he presented to the Liverpool District Missionary Association, as their missionary minister. He quoted the reference of Dr. John Watson in the Hibbert Journal to the Unitarian denomination as approaching extinction, and his pious wish that they would not disappear from history "before they had made the other Churches heirs of their moral integrity and their love of truth." Personally, Mr. Roberts added, I do not see why lovers of truth should not have a church as well as the non-lovers of truth; rather, I see every possible reason why they should. But may I corroborate Dr. John Watson's testimony, and tell the people commonly called Unitarian that, whether they know it or not, they stand for a principle of Truth that alone is able to regenerate the world. And quoting a further remark of Dr. Watson's, he said, "The fact is, they seem to be 'immured in a cell,' not 'because they look on life through a loop-hole of retreat,' but because, being themselves in the broadest daylight, they do so little to help those who are actually enchained in cells of dogmatic darkness." Mr. Roberts gave instances of what men still had to suffer for the avowal of Unitarianism; and then, speaking further of the great liberality of some of our people towards other educational and philanthropic objects, while the missionary work of the churches was starved, he continued: "So far as I can judge, it is their fear of being 'narrow' and 'sectarian' that, paradoxically enough, has immured them in their own meeting-houses, and has made them appear selfish by guarding and treasuring for themselves that which their generous and grateful souls would otherwise have scattered abroad. If all upholders and lovers of a reverent free thought could have my experience with men and women who crave the best gifts of God, truth and love, they would never grudgingly hold their hand. Could they only once appreciate the beneficent impact on individual, civic, national, and the common world-life of the principles they personally cherish, they would be as eager to propagate fearless religious truth as they are to further noble ideals of education, and to hold out pitying hands to those in physical distress."

An interesting and helpful discussion followed, opened by the Rev. J. Ruddle, and continued by the Rev. Cobden Smith, Mr. Cuthbert Grundy, Mr. W. J. Watson, President of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, Mrs. Edward Haworth, of Accrington, and the Revs. J. Morley Mills and A. L. Smith.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH read the second paper on "Our Churches and the Theory of Independency," dealing in a thoroughly practical manner with the problem of city churches. The greater part of this paper we intend to publish in full next week, and may then add some notes on the discussion, which was opened by Mr. James Beard, and continued by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, Mr. T. F. Robinson, Mr. J. Wigley, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and the chairman.

Wednesday Afternoon.

At the afternoon conference the chair was taken by Mr. William Long, and papers on "The Strengthening of our Congregational Life" were read by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin and Mr. J. Wigley. Mr. Austin's ideal of a world-wide church we hope before long to be able to present fully to our readers. Mr. Wigley's paper dealt with points of immediate practical application, urging greater loyalty in attendance at public worship, more helpful positive preaching, inspired by the "passion for souls," and especial care in the religious training of the young, and the guarding of their growing life from the corrupting evils of the world. He pointed to the example of the great Central Mission of the Wesleyans, to show what might be done with an old city chapel.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD opened the discussion, affirming her faith in the efficacy of the strictly congregational principle, and was followed by Mr. John Heys and the Revs. F. T. Mott and Francis Wood.

The Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS then read a paper on "A Church of the Present," which we reserve for future publication, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie moved an inclusive vote of thanks to the organisers of the meetings and the readers of papers, with special acknowledgments to the Revs. W. Holmshaw and J. A. Pearson, secretaries of the local committee, and the Rev. D. Agate, who had charge of the hospitality arrangements, and also to the chairman.

The motion was carried with acclamation and acknowledged by Mr. Holmshaw and the Chairman. The meeting closed with hymn and benediction.

In the evening a conversazione was held in the Hall of the new Midland Hotel, and on Thursday the Conference of the Sunday School Association brought the series of meetings to a close. Of this we hope to publish a report next week.

HAS LONDON A SOUL?

SUCH is the question asked by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed in a brief article in the November Unitarian World:—

"Has London a soul? Will our London of to-day be remembered for anything beautiful or noble in future ages, like ancient Athens or Jerusalem? No city is without some good men—yea, more than ten in every one that ever was, despite the legend which tells us of Sodom's lack. And London, perhaps, has more righteous men and women amongst her six million souls than any other city ever had. But what do they count for in its mighty, pulsing, sensitive life, so fraught with pain and disasters, yet also with the many things men call success? Does the leaven work? Does the salt give savour to the whole? Will our London be remembered through the ages as a holy city whose citizens held some ideal of God or man more precious than comfort or power, or even daily bread? Or are we in truth a very small and insignificant city, big only in bulk, but contemptible in comparison to the really great? These questions will be answered by other lips than ours—but it lies with us to dictate what they shall say. Now, while it is called to-day, we may work and love and live—and if there are any of us, even a handful, who will live, amongst these myriads, as men who care for some idea above the conveniences or luxuries of life, then even we may yet do much to awaken this city of the dead and dying, more than half lost as it is in the belief that a man's life consists in the number of things he possesses."

"If we would speak or act with power, then we must know the peace of God amidst the city's din. It were as hopeless for us to attempt to influence this great life about us for good, as it would be for us to move the sea—unless we have ourselves drunk deeply at the source of power. If the clatter of daily life, with its importunate trivialities, is always breaking upon our spirits, we shall be empty vessels, unprofitable members. At all hazards we must learn to taste ourselves of that peace which the world cannot take away. For if we ministers—and in our little body we must needs all be ministers; not one hand can be spared in the service of spreading the truth and light which according to our measure we have received—if we ministers, I say, have not 'drunk of the one spirit' how shall we hope to guide men to the wells of water springing up into eternal life, whereof who drinketh shall never thirst again. This peace of God, which alone can make us strong for warfare with the powers of evil, is the pearl of great price which we must sell all to win; it is the food and drink and breath of the soul, without which it cannot live, and to gain the whole world without it is to profit nothing. This is the end of our worship, of our preaching, of our various organisations and agencies for the spread of our faith."

ISLINGTON THEATRE SERVICE.

THE first of the series of popular religious services in the Grand Theatre, Islington, was held on Sunday evening, the series at Greenwich having been concluded on the previous Sunday with a service conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. A large amount of earnest work had been put into the endeavour, by young and old from the various North London churches. When the services were arranged, Unity Church was without a minister, and that congregation, being so near the Grand Theatre, determined to close their church on the four evenings involved, and their recent settlement with the Rev. E. Savell Hicks did not alter this arrangement. Unity Church also lent material, and their schoolroom formed a centre from which canvassers distributed thousands of circulars in the district, principally under the direction of Mr. Boult, of Hampstead. Mr. Arnold Jones, from Little Portland-street, drilled an efficient choir of about forty singers, gathered from the various churches, the orchestra being the same as at Greenwich, but enlarged to suit the needs of the larger hall. The canvassers came from all directions, but special praise must be given to Highgate for their band of young and enthusiastic helpers, and a party of about twenty from there and elsewhere had tea at Unity Church School on Sunday, after a final distribution of circulars. The service at the theatre was attended by from 450 to 500 persons, which number, although not answering the expectations of some of the enthusiastic younger helpers, comfortably filled a good portion of the theatre. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, who gave an address on "A Man's Working Religion." He did not wish, he said, to dwell on the differences that divide Unitarians from other Christians, but to preach a practical sermon that might appeal to all, regardless of creed. People really cared very little for all the multitudes of books and tracts and pamphlets on religion and for all the discussions, on nice points of theology. These things as a matter of fact hardly entered into their lives at all. What he wanted to get down to was the working religion of the average man, the beliefs on which he depended for guidance and help. Every man has to reckon with the fact that there was a power outside himself making for righteousness, constantly constraining him to live according to certain laws. When men disobeyed and contravened these laws, boasting they could do what they liked, they were only proving their own foolishness, and would inevitably suffer until they brought themselves into harmony with the great forces of the world. No man could escape the consequences of his actions, and to think he could do so was simply to juggle with common sense. This was no gospel of despair, shutting out forgiveness, but they must remember that not even forgiveness could undo the evil wrought by a bad life. The farmer might forgive his lad for the neglect that had caused the ruin of the crop, but that did not alter the fact that the tares were still growing in the field. God in His infinite love would forgive a man his sins, but only one thing could, to some extent, wipe out the results of the past, viz., his own earnest striving to pluck out the weeds that were choking his life. Let them all pray that God might abide with them, teaching them more and more of His will, the light of His presence brightening the shadows of time till the light of Eternity should fall upon them all.

We are very glad to hear also of the success of the Popular Services in the Manchester Palace of Varieties, where the numbers attending have greatly exceeded those at the London services. On Sunday week the first service was taken by the Rev. James C. Street, and the attendance was variously estimated at 1,000 and 1,200. Last Sunday the Rev. J. Page Hopps was the preacher, and the attendance rose to 1,500. Here also careful preparation for the services had been made by abundant advertising and the organising of a large band of stewards, the work being under the direction of Mr. Richard Robinson, a well-tried organiser, who had the earlier experience of the Rotunda Services in Liverpool for guidance and encouragement. The choir of eighty voices was under the direction of Mr. O. H. Heys.

DAYS OF CREATION AND THE GLADNESS OF LIFE.

I.

IT was evening, and the sun went down in quiet splendour at the close of a long summer day. Beyond the smoke and the dingy roofs of a great city the light glowed in the sky to the north and west, and through an open window, high up in one of the tall ugly houses, the noises of the streets, subdued by the coming on of night, brought no distressful or discordant sound. For now, for most of those who laboured and struggled there, the long day's toil was ended; the spirit of rest was slowly mastering the strife and turmoil of the streets, and claiming the hearts of men for leisured thought and quietness. Another day of life—the last the world thus far had known—was passing away, and the great calm mystery of this ever-advancing time-movement offered again its problem to the wondering mind. And, as if to take away any sad or depressing thoughts which might be hovering near, the words of a modern prophet, full of grave and serene confidence, awoke in the memory and seemed to take possession of the scene: "Say not, as night comes on, 'Another day is gone,' but rather, 'I have lived a day.'" And, in truth, we human brothers—all the thousands of us in this crowded city—had lived another day; and creation—the living process of God in the world—had pressed onward, unwearied and unresting, through another day, revealing something more of nature's wise intent, and evolution's large unfoldings, on the stage of time.

A Dream of Perfect Day.

Very wonderful are the "days" when they appear to us, in their dawn and setting, as brief periods or little rounded epochs in the world's long movement of creative purpose. Once men thought that six of them sufficed in which to "make" a world, and that on the seventh everything was finished, and God could rest from all His labour, and man awake to enter on his large and new inheritance. And then, an ancient poet said, "The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." And sometimes even now, in the early hours of a summer day, when the dew is on the grass, and the freshness of dawn is in the air, and birds sing aloud for joy, thoughts come to us of a first glad day—the first "sweet and serious morning" of the created world. It is beautiful to dream of it, to let the imagination carry us back to a time when the earth was finished and appeared fresh and new from the creative Mind, perfect in form, swathed in the glowing light of sunrise, infinitely fair. All living things were glad; all shapes inanimate were fashioned with perfect grace and loveliness; no evil thing was there, no discord, no distress; a pure and peaceful earth, the home of happy creatures, innocent and gentle, was "created and made."

An Unfolding Order.

No such morning ever was. It is a poet's bright and beautiful fancy, which science—proud, exultant science—has destroyed. Creation is no work of a day, or of six days, or of six millions of days. It is an age-long process; it is an eternal movement, an unfolding order, an evolution of law and of life. This earth is a fragment of the sun, flung off into space, and gradually cooling there, as it swept along its way, became at last the home of minute forms of life, and these, unfolding into new and more complex forms, peopled land and sea with myriads of creatures, till in the great advancing purpose of things, a being of nobler type appeared—the lithe, supple, marvellously fashioned, upright form of primeval man. And he, slowly developing new powers, attains at length to thought, becomes conscious of himself, looks round on his wonderful dwelling place, asks the great questions, whence and why and whither? learns to love and hate, to doubt, to dream, to worship; gathers knowledge, builds cities, conquers, or thinks to conquer, earth and sea and wide regions of air, and finally makes for himself a vaster home in worlds unrealised, beyond the grave, beyond the sun, beyond all visible things.

So that old conception of a once perfect state, with man innocent of heart, of clear intelligence and obedient will, dwelling secure in an earthly paradise, has been gently but firmly taken away from us and can be ours no more. The past, we believe, was not better or happier than the present. The earth and her children are as good now as in any former time. No morning ever dawned more fair than that which dawned to-day, or shall dawn to-morrow, somewhere on this planet. Beauty and goodness and joy are not less—we believe them to be more than when, six thousand years ago (as men once thought), the earth was made, and man, in the image of God, awoke in the garden of Eden, to behold its loveliness, to tend its plants, to name and rule its living creatures, and presently to meet, by the side of its flowing stream, the beauteous form of one who should be his other self, who should win his love and wreck his happiness, and lead him forth into a wider, sadder, and more arduous life.

Newness of Life.

Yet science, which took from us the dream of a happy golden age in the past, has given us something better than that which it took away. In truth, it may claim to have re-created the world for us, and made us to see it "new every morning," and taught the mind to rejoice in the unity and order of its unfolding life. That "singing of the morning stars together," of which the author of the Book of Job heard, as he thought, some far off strain, becomes for us now a poet's fine expression for the harmony of nature's ceaseless movement and untiring energy of toil; even as the ear of Pythagoras caught the faint and distant pealing of the "music of the spheres." This "sounding labour-house vast of Being" is the ordered activity of creation, bringing forth fresh forms of life and loveliness, in obedience to sure and changeless laws. The mighty universe lives and works, and the unity of its purpose, though not the fulfilment thereof, becomes more and more clear. The law of gravitation bids us think of every particle of matter, throughout all space, as linked with every other by one attracting power, so that nothing is alien, or dissevered from the whole; while the glorious dream of evolution is but a gathering of all creatures that the fertile earth sustains into one large household of life.

The Great Harmony.

A secret solemn harmony thus reveals itself, pervading the universe of space and of time; the manifold world which we behold, and to which we belong, appears as an unwearied creation of ordered unity—a cosmos of beauty and of law; and we too may say, with yet greater wonderings of heart, that at every dawn "the morning stars sing together," and every day "the sons of God do shout for joy."

The Human Discord.

And yet for us poor human folk it may seem but rarely possible to join in that song or to raise that shout. For we have broken the harmony of creation, and destroyed the unity of its work—so, at least, 'twould seem. We have managed to create, both within and without, some discord and confusion in the world of life. Probably it is much less than to our troubled and feverish imagination it often appears. We are a disturbing element in the world, but not such desperate and fatal disturbers as we suppose. Our finite wills, our limited and partial independence, may seem to work in opposition to the order and purposes of Nature. But it cannot be really so. It is a passing human trouble, not a permanent disaster or disgrace, that we have wrought. The disturbance is for us only, and even for us only for a while. No deity is offended, and no purpose really baffled. Nature keeps time and tune, however we bluster and worry, and fail to keep our appointments with her. We too are a stage in the great onward movement of creation; and for the creatures below us there is nothing the matter, and to those above, if there be such—to those who are further on in the line of progress, our confusion and distress may appear as a part of the rightful and inevitable order of things, moving steadily, though for us often painfully, to the music of the whole.

The Word of Peace.

And there are moments, perhaps, in the life of nearly all men, when the great calm of Nature, or of spirit, comes over the soul, and they hear with joy that solemn "music of the spheres," and enter into peace. It is possible for the mind to escape for a season from the tumult of the world and the storm of human passion, and feel itself to be a part of the great unity of things. Not often and not long can this be for most. While in the flesh, the outward shows and deceptive appearances have too great power over us. But it is well to be as sober and sensible and serene of spirit as we can. It is wise to keep as near as we may to thoughts and things, to words and scenes and sentiments, that make for inward calm and joy, that recall the mind to a sense of the world's great order in time and space and life.

W. J. JUPP.

EFFORTS, to be permanently useful, must be uniformly joyous—a spirit all sunshine—graceful from very gladness, beautiful because bright.—Carlyle.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Blackfriars: Miisson and Stamford-street Chapel.—An old friend of the mission, and superintendent of the Sunday-school, Mr. James Welch, was returned unopposed last week as a Councillor for the Borough of Southwark. The winter's work is now in full swing, all the clubs and meetings being well attended, whilst the Monday popular concerts, in spite of the continuous wet weather, have averaged over 330 auditors every night.

Blackpool: South Shore.—Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy requests that all communications concerning the church may be addressed until further notice to the church secretary, Mr. S. Crompton, 371, Lytham-road, South Blackpool.

Croydon—(Appointment).—The Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Liverpool, has accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation from the congregation of the Free Christian Church to become their minister in succession to the Rev. J. Page Hopps.

Doncaster.—A sale of work for the purpose of providing means for the renovation of the chapel was held on the 28th and 29th ult., and was opened by Mr. A. J, Hobson, of Sheffield, ex-Master Cutler. The proceeds, after the deduction of expenses, were £46.

Dukinfield.—The first of a series of discourses on the parables of Jesus was delivered in the old chapel on Sunday evening to a large congregation. The Rev. J. C. Odgers will preach on "Pharisee and Publican" next Sunday. The annual choir sermons were preached on Sunday week, November 1, by the Rev. H. S. Tayler. He took for hia morning subject, "The joy of the harp," and for the evening "The music of church bells." There was special music by an augmented choir. The collections amounted to over £35, an increase on last year.

Exeter.—In the lecture-hall of George's Chapel, on Monday evening, Mr. Eric Lemmon gave an interesting account of his visit to Holland in connection with the international meetings at Amsterdam last September.

Leeds (Hunslet).—On Monday evening Mr. and Mrs. Thornton gave an "At Home" to the congregation in celebration of the marriage of their daughter, Miss S. Thornton, A.R.C.M. Upwards of a hundred guests sat down to tea, and after an organ recital in the church, a very pleasant evening was spent in the schoolroom with music and a lantern exhibition, &c.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel (Resignation).—The Rev. W. J. Jupp, having accepted an invitation to the Croydon Free Christian Church, has resigned the pulpit of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.

London: Islington (Welcome Meeting).—A thoroughly successful congregational soirée was held in the schoolroom of Unity Church on Thursday evening, November 5, for the purpose of welcoming the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, who, on the previous Sunday, entered on his ministry of the church, The room was crowded, and a very pleasant feature of the meeting was the presence of ministers of other denominations, and messages of sympathy received from others who were unable to be present. Of the present congregation, Mr. J. T. Preston and Miss Preston represented the survivors of the old Carter-lane congregation. The chair was taken by Mr. A. Wilson, and, after the singing of an opening hymn, the secretary reported friendly letters of regret that they were unable to be present in response to the committee's invitation from the Vicar of Islington, the Rev. W. J. Dawson, of the Highbury Quadrant Chapel, the Rev. W. H. Harwood, of Union Chapel, J. G. Henderson, and Elvet Lewis, also Congregational ministers in the neighbourhood. The Revs. Dr. Mummery and W. G. Tarrant and others also wrote, sending their cordial good wishes. Mr. J. T. Preston, the veteran of the congregation, offered a warm welcome to Mr. Hicks, recalling the memories of forty years ago, when Carter-lane Chapel was sold, and Unity Church built, and noting the changed condition since then, but expressing the strong conviction that there was scope for building up a strong congregation here. He urged the clear declaration of Unitarian principles, appeal to the young people, and diligent visiting as essential to the attainment of success. The Rev. Dr. Hall, of a neighbouring Presbyterian church, then offered a welcome on behalf of ministers of other denominations, and said that he was delighted to be there, as a mark of sympathy with minister and congregation in the union they were celebrating. He trusted it would result in lasting good to all concerned. Honestly, he confessed, it was on account of James Martineau that he was there on that occasion, whom he acknowledged as one of the masters of his life. With humour and good sense, Dr. Henderson then added some advice to the congregation, warning them against lack of concentration in their undertakings, and bidding them to allow time to their minister for his own special work. The Rev. Charles Garnett, minister of Arundel-road Church, also joined cordially in the welcome, expressing the conviction that, amid all differences of doctrine, they could have sympathy in the religious domain as well as in social work, striving together for the common cause of the kingdom of God. The Rev. C. J. Street, with whom Mr. Hicks had worked for three years in Bolton, bore warm testimony to his capacity and his eminent fitness for the ministry, and auguring well for a prosperous future for the congregation and their new minister. The Revs. H. Gow and W. Copeland Bowie, on behalf of London ministers, and Mr. Classon Preston, as one of the distant members of the congregation, who could not regularly attend the services, added words of sympathy and good wishes, and Mr. Hicks then responded, warmly acknowledging the great kindness he had received, and speaking with hopefulness and good courage and earnest purpose of the work on which he was entering. The singing of the Doxology brought the very pleasant evening to a close.

London (Lewisham).—Dr. Blake Odgers paid his annual visit to the Literary and Scientific Society last Monday, when he delighted the members with his exposition of "Lancelot and Elaine."

Malton.—Harvest services were held on Sunday, October 25, with a sacred concert in the afternoon. Rev. W. Rodger Smyth preached in the evining on "A Bit of Thanksgiving." On Monday evening following Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., gave a lecture, "A Visit to Hungary and Transylvania," with limelight views.

Parkstone.—On Sunday, November 1, opening the winter programme of work, the services, both afternoon and evening, were conducted by Mr. G. Cosens Prior, of Portsmouth, who preached to good and appreciative congregations. On Sunday, November 8, at the afternoon meeting, a service of song was rendered, entitled "Eva," Mr. Bushrod giving the connective readings.

Pudsey: Unitarian Church.—The forty-second anniversary of the church took place last Sunday, when the newly appointed minister, the Rev. Edgar Lockett, officiated. The afternoon service was chiefly musical, and in addition to anthems by an augmented choir, quartettes were rendered by members of the Bradford Unitarian choir, and solos were contributed by several friends. The evening service also included special solos. Mr. J. W. Varley conducted and Mr. F. W. Wilson presided at the organ. Mr. Lockett, in the course of his address in the afternoon, referred to his settlement as their minister He spoke of the freedom of their church, quoting a recent significant statement of Dr. Horton's on that subject, and then warned them, in conclusion, never for a moment to dream that freedom was enough—that freedom alone would redeem them or help them to redeem others. It was not freedom or truth, but the use they made of them that counted. If they were to be a living church they must get their life from the eternal source of life. They must have real communion with God. In a word they must be a praying church, and they must try to live more nearly as they prayed.

South Shields.—The anniversary services of the Unity Church Sunday School were held on Sunday, November 1. The special preacher was the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesboro'. Mr. Lambelle also addressed a large gathering of scholars and friends in the afternoon. Special hymns were rendered in the afternoon, and the choir added their share towards a most successful celebration.

Wakefield.—The anniversary services and congregational soirée were held on November 8 and 9, and were well attended and helpful. On Sunday, the devotional part of the services was conducted by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, and the special music and litanies were finely rendered. Two impressive and inspiring sermons were preached by the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, of Ainsworth, who also addressed the Sunday scholars in the afternoon. On Monday evening nearly two hundred people partook of tea in the school-rooms, and a hearty welcome was given to all by Mr. Chalmers, who acted as chairman. In his summary of the activities of the year, he spoke of the unbroken harmony that pervaded all their intercourse, and he rejoiced to see that the influence of the chapel and school passed into their home life. Votes of thanks were passed to the Rev. M. R. Scott for his help on the previous day, and to the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, of Hull (both of whom were present) for conducting the floral services in July last. Both responded in stirring addresses. A pleasing incident of the evening was the passing of a resolution of congratulation to the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, of Bury, who is a trustee of Westgate Chapel, on his appointment to Ullet-road Church, Liverpool. A vote of thanks to all helpers brought a very enjoyable evening to a close.

Yorkshire Unitarian Lay-Preachers' Union.—With the idea of drawing the members more closely together, and, if possible, infusing more energy into the important work of lay-preaching, a meeting was held in the Mill Hill Schools, Leeds, on Saturday last. Widely scattered, as the members are, over the county of broad acres, twenty out of a possible twenty-three were present. Mr. W. F. Clay (Leeds) was voted to the chair. After the secretary, Mr. Fred Clayton (Leeds), had made a statement setting forth the position of the Union, an interesting discussion took place, and various suggestions were made with a view of placing the Union upon a more substantial and satisfactory basis. Mr. James Tompson (Pudsey) was elected president, Mr. Fred Clayton was re-elected secretary, and Messrs. Stainer, Foster, and Clay constituted the committee. After tea, Mr. J. Dungworth (Sheffield) introduced the subject, "Do our Lay-Preachers receive the consideration to which their work reasonably entitles them?" Many difficulties encountered by laymen in prosecuting their work were enumerated, long distances in bad weather, cold railway journeys, early starting and late arriving at home, &c. The result of an interesting discussion appeared to be a fear that the self-sacrifices of the lay-preachers were generally under-estimated and lightly appreciated. Mr. F. Blackwell also introduced the subject of "The Relation of the Lay-Preacher to the Church," his contention being that all lay-preachers should be connected with our churches and Sunday-schools. After considerable discussion, the general opinion seemed to coincide with the views expressed by Mr. Blackwell. After agreeing to meet quarterly the readers of the papers were accorded hearty thanks, and the singing of the Doxology brought to a termination the best, heartiest, and most cheering gathering at the Yorkshire Union of Unitarian Lay-Preachers.

THE meetings of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, held at Leicester on Tuesday and Wednesday, at the same time as the autumn meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, we must report next week.

THERE is one kind of untruthfulness that seems a little more despicable than any other. It is the implied lie; the silence when not to speak will convey a false impression; when to speak would make oneself responsible; the half-truth, which will hurt someone else and clear our own skirts.—M. Butler.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE discussion on Missionary Aims and Methods, to which three more contributions will be found in our present issue, will be concluded next week by Mr. Barrow's reply. Then also we must publish our report of the Autumn Meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening.

THE King and Queen of Italy have received a very cordial welcome on their visit to our country this week, and on Thursday morning, when they came into the City, there was happily a clear sky and a feeling of sunshine in the air. It is matter for sincere thankfulness that the ties of friendship between Italy and France and Great Britain should be closely knit. What we must hope is that the strength of these three great Liberal Powers may be speedily exercised to ensure the liberation of Macedonia from intolerable wrong.

OUR position and intentions in Thibet, as described by a news agency this week, stand sorely in need of further explanation. In the first half of the year, we are told, "strong representations" were made to the Thibetan authorities "regarding the non-observance of the existing treaties, and the consequent standstill of trade between India and Thibet." Then a "mission" was sent under Colonel Younghusband "to meet the Thibetan and Chinese officials to discuss questions of trade." This mission, which penetrated thirty miles into Thibetan territory, had an escort of 300 Sikhs and a maxim gun—a curious equipment for a commercial envoy travelling in the territory of a friendly neighbour in time of peace. The Thibetans refused to have anything to do with the mission till it had retired into Indian territory. Colonel Younghusband refused to retire and proceeded to entrench and fortify himself in Thibetan territory, where his "mission" still remains.

RUMOURS having come from Lhassa that an attempt was to be made to eject the invaders by force, an appeal was made for reinforcements, and now it is stated that an expeditionary force is to be despatched next week, to include a number of British troops, which is not merely to relieve the "mission" at Khamba Jong, but is to penetrate some ninety miles further, to Gyangtse, only 150 miles from Lhassa itself. As it stands the story looks like nothing but a deliberate attempt to pick a quarrel, by hook or by crook, as an excuse for extending our borders, and it is earnestly to be hoped that an official explanation will be forthcoming putting a different complexion on the matter. Unfortunately the history of our frontier relations is not without incidents which make the tale far less impossible of belief than one could wish.

THE name of Lord Rowton, the news of whose death has been received with general regret, is closely associated in our minds with the Earl of Beaconsfield and with improved lodging houses. This conjunction may serve to indicate Lord Rowton's many-sided character. The "Rowton Houses" are familiar words, and it is in connection with them that his memory is likely to last longest, as that of one who has left behind him a record of useful social work. It is true that the setting up of comfortable lodging houses for working men has been criticised as tending to impair the strength of home affections, but the value of such poor men's hotels can hardly be doubted by anyone who knows the actual conditions of a crowded town district. Lodgings for single men in a tenement room, that is almost filled as to the floor space by two beds, each of which is to be occupied by two lodgers, are not so healthy or desirable as to prevent our satisfaction when a good substitute is provided. The "Rowton Houses" are also admirable if we compare them with the earlier type of private lodging house. They owe their superiority almost entirely to the philanthropic enterprise of the late Lord Rowton.

AT the same time, it would be a mistake to suppose, as is occasionally suggested, that the "Rowton Houses" can solve the housing problem. Such a wild fancy can only spring from the curious preference for remedies that are easy, though they are not remedial, over those which may be efficacious but are certainly difficult. The utility of the "Rowton Houses," though within its proper limits very considerable, is a humbler one; viz., to provide a decent and comparatively refined residence for those who do not easily fit into the pattern of our normal domestic system. There is one other matter which it would not be right to omit from any notice of Lord Rowton's work; it was performed not only with enthusiasm but with scrupulous attention to details. The handsome furniture, the glazed bricks, the pictures on the walls at once catch the eye; it may not be so generally known that the wood used in making the tables was selected as that which could most easily be kept most clean and pleasant for use. And this is only one illustration of the care that contributed to success in a scheme that is at once a valuable achievement and a stimulating object lesson.

THE Manchester City Council, following the example of Salford, has resolved to establish Municipal Concerts in public halls during the winter months. The principle involved has been accepted long ago by the provision of music in the parks, and the organ recitals of Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne, the City organist, on Saturday evenings in the Town Hall. The extension of this department of civic organisation for the wholesome amusement of the people, is not expected to involve any considerable expense. The small charge made for admission may even cover the whole cost of the entertainment, considering the large numbers who throng inexpensive places of amusement, and under municipal control objectionable features can be avoided which are too often present in the music halls.

ESSEX HALL was well filled on Thursday week at a meeting of the Humanitarian League for a discussion on the subject of "Vivisection." The opening paper (which is to be published in the Humane Review) was by Mr. Edward Carpenter, who unfortunately was prevented by illness from being present. It was read by his brother, Captain Carpenter, R.N., and strongly insisted that the method of vivisection was cruel, unnatural, and misleading, and that the actual scientific results attained were inconsiderable, while great medical advances had been made by natural and hygienic methods.

THE action for libel and slander brought by Dr. Bayliss, of University College, against the Hon. Stephen Coleridge, hon. secretary of the Anti-Vivisection Society, resulted on Wednesday in a verdict for the plaintiff, with £2,000 damages. The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up the case, pointed out that the question was not whether vivisection was right or wrong, but whether under the present law the plaintiff was guilty of the charge made against him of using a dog for a demonstration without the proper use of anæsthetics. On the evidence that the dog was completely unconscious the jury decided for the plaintiff as above stated. It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Coleridge should have taken this most unfortunate step, in his eager advocacy of what we take to be a thoroughly good cause, and should have rendered himself liable to so severe a sentence.

AT the conclusion of his sermon on temperance reform, from which we quoted last week, the Rev. C. Hargrove makes the following forcible quotation from the Hospital of October 10. Having noted various measures of reform for which we ought to work, he adds:—And, what is perhaps most important of all, that when "six public-houses are licensed to every school that is built, and complaints are made that the national physique is deteriorating, and that the British workman is being ousted from the labour market; that the example of the United States and Canada should be followed, and scientific temperance teaching be included in the school curriculum; that the children should learn, for example, that alcohol is a poison and not a food; that it is not necessary to health or life; that its use is detrimental to vital force and power; that all the natural functions of mind and body may be performed without it; and that its habitual use predisposes the body to disease, and makes recovery from disease more difficult. And if instruction has any value at all, it should obviously, on a question of such vital importance to the health of the nation, be made definite, systematic, and compulsory."

A LINE of electric cars is running to Croydon. The tramway terminus is at Purley, and there has been a rapid development of house building in that suburb. The series, tram, dwelling houses, population, is not complete without the house of worship. Accordingly, the foundation-stone of a new Congregational church has been laid. The movements of an urban population demand the attention of many different authorities. If it is to the suburbs, it is from the centre. Fresh facilities for locomotion render old Board Schools unnecessary in the inner districts of our cities. Churches as well as schools are being closed. Yet the central districts are not depopulated, and provision will still be needed for their religious wants. At the same time, the new suburban towns must be remembered, and every electric tram line suggests the need for new churches to minister to the new migration of the people. Each neighbourhood acquires by degrees its own character. And to each new church there comes the opportunity of building up on the experience of the past a loftier tradition for the future.

To the November Cornhill Mrs. Ritchie contributes another of her delightful "Blackstick Papers," telling of Miss Eliza Horace Smith, "who died in her house at Brighton but the other day," the eldest and last surviving daughters of Horace Smith, of "Rejected Addresses." She remembered Keats and Shelley, and her father's constant kindness to the latter, and Mrs. Shelley coming to him in despair to Versailles after her husband's death. Mrs. Ritchie tells of the bright clever woman, and the society she and her sister enjoyed in the old days at Brighton. "Yes," she once said, laughingly, in answer to a question, "I suppose we certainly had what people call a salon, but what we piqued ourselves most upon was that it never led to a salle à manger." And Mrs. Ritchie adds:—

It is a received fact that people cannot eat and talk comfortably at the same time, and the superiority of the wit and the conversation of those bygone educated tea-tables to that of our more elaborate dinner-tables may be easily explained. Our generation writes when it wishes to be heard, that one wrote less, talked more, and more to the point; it read more thoroughly—in its own books, and not in Mudie's only; and people, having fewer acquaintances, gave themselves more to their friends.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—A well attended meeting of the committee of the Conference took place on the 10th inst., at Manchester, when a resolution was passed in favour of a joint meeting during 1904 of representatives of all trusts, funds and associations contributing to the incomes of ministers, the support of congregations and the education of students for the ministry, with a view to consider the possibility of co-operation in the work of aiding the maintenance of the ministry. The Advisory and Settlements Sub-Committee presented a report which expressed the opinion that the creation of a proposed board for assisting ministers to vacant pulpits would prove injurious to the independence of both ministers and congregations alike. They also deprecated the re-opening of the proposal of an advisory board for the United Kingdom, recalling the opposition which the matter met with at the gathering at Nottingham in 1890. This report led to considerable discussion, and was eventually referred back to the sub-committee, to which additional members were added.

A statement from the treasurer showed that the recent appeal for funds had met with a very scanty response, and a special sub-committee was appointed to take further steps.

The committee then adjourned until January 14, 1904.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"GOD AN INFERENCE."

SIR,—At the evening meeting in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, held last week, the Rev. J. Page Hopps made a speech in which he used these words:—"God is an inference; you can have no experience of God." My recollection of the words is confirmed by others to whom I have spoken. Such a declaration seems to me to take away the ground of all personal religion, and to be, on that account, likely to give a wholly misleading impression of what our religion is. In the hope that I may have misunderstood Mr. Hopps' meaning, I would respectfully ask him, through you, to throw some further light on his statement.

UNITARIANS AND TEMPERANCE.

WE have received a letter from the Rev. A. O. Ashworth, of Belfast, who writes as a total abstainer, to enter a friendly protest against the implication of a letter, which we published on October 31, that only total abstainers are "pledged on the side of temperance." On this he remarks:—"I have many dear friends in our ministry, who, as yet, are not able from conviction to be abstainers, who still interest themselves in temperance work. Three of my brother ministers in this country (there may be more), though not abstainers, have living organisations in connection with their churches on temperance lines, doing, as I know, excellent work, in which they take an active interest. To seek an explanation of their non-abstention from the use of intoxicants seems to me to be injudicious, if not a violent interference with the liberty of the subject, an appeal to coercion unworthy of temperance reformers, and a course more likely to defeat than win the object in view. Our business is rather to rely upon example and appeal to sympathy and self-sacrifice."

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY, NOVEMBER, 29.—The following churches have promised to give special temperance sermons on this day, or have recently done so:—

MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS.

X.

"IT is a part of its history," says Mr. Barrow, "that in the home the Manchester Domestic Mission began its work." This might mean that for a considerable period the M.D.M. limited itself to ministration "in the home." But the fact is that in the first year of its existence it had already made provision for public worship and established a Sunday-school. And can it, then, be quite fairly described as having been, even at first, "a mission without a church"? The history of Domestic Missions does not favour a narrow interpretation of the word domestic. Mr. Steinthal mentions (INQUIRER, October 31) how Dr. Tuckerman, within a month after starting on the enterprise that made him famous, found himself practically minister of a congregation. Further, he is "quite sure" that Dr. Tuckerman's ideal of a domestic mission was not Mr. Barrow's; and probably Dr. Tuckerman's ideal was that of the founders of the M.D.M., who would look to him as an authority.

But what is Mr. Barrow's ideal? He himself has not told us as plainly as he could—perhaps because he saw that a clear and explicit statement of it would be virtually a programme of reform, or rather a revolution, which he had no wish to offer. At any rate, unless I have misunderstood him, his doctrine is revolutionary, and logically demands nothing less than the destruction of our existing missions. A domestic mission ought to be "a mission without a church." It is not the missionary's business to organise scattered individuals into anything like a church or congregation, but to deal with them singly in their homes, or wherever he can catch them. (For one relaxation of the rule that his ministry shall be strictly domestic is allowed: some of his work may be done in the street or at the prison gate and among homeless persons.) The only aim that deserves to be called a missionary aim is the distinctly religious one of "spiritual regeneration" or edification; and he shall pursue it exclusively, leaving "social work" to agencies not missionary or religious. What need has he, then, on Sunday or week-day, for his work's sake, of any other building than the homes (or prisons or hospitals) that he visits? The first step towards the realisation of this ideal would be to close our chapels and Sunday-schools; and to improve our mission buildings were only to go further astray. Without being an obstinate conservative, one may be unable to accept this very radical doctrine.

In the name Domestic Mission both words are, unfortunately, capable of a narrow interpretation. But another recognised name for the same thing is Ministry to the Poor; and nothing hinders our conceiving the scope of a ministry to the poor in a broad and generous spirit. It may aim, as for many years the M.D.M. has aimed, at supplying the poor with just those aids to the Christian life which others find efficacious—religious fellowship, social worship, and whatever else a church offers to its members. Granted that this has to be done, the question presents itself what more we can do. It is a question of resources, and here the generous spirit may encounter a check. For instance, when Mr. Barrow asks, "Do you acknowledge any duty in respect of the outcast, the fallen, the criminal?" it is hard to say bluntly, No! But I think the right answer is that they are only a section of the poor, and so much a class apart as to require a separate ministry to themselves. Must we, if we have to choose, minister to them, and neglect the honest, worthy poor?

Mr. Barrow "does not believe in provided churches of any kind." It has been pertinently replied that many churches, perhaps the majority, are to a large extent "provided" by endowments or by the gifts of wealthy living subscribers, so that very many who use them do not really pay their own way. A fact of my own observing is that some mission people pay, through the weekly offertory, more than some voting members of independent congregations. "A working-class church," Mr. Barrow says, "must think and act and provide for itself, to be in any real sense a living church." Is that said of a working-class church alone, or intended to apply all round—say, to Anglican parishes? It is hardly true, without qualification, of any church. Our mission people know well enough how the facts stand. There is no reproach in the name "mission" (unless it is narrowed down to mean a ministry to the degraded and heathenish), and they feel none. They regard their minister as a missionary in the sense of a man sent among them, not appointed or paid by themselves. They do not find their self-respect wounded by the arrangement. Why should they? A Church of England clergyman and his people are usually in much the same case.

The separation of social from distinctly religious work (so Mr. Barrow explained when he read his paper) is advocated, not as an ideal, but as a "counsel of despair." I see no need for despair or the appropriate counsel. Institutional churches, in which all kinds of social work are done, are a modern invention and coming into favour. We do things on a smaller scale at Renshaw-street; but it would be injurious (the wisest of my young people agree with me) to sever our week-day recreation, at clubs, classes, and evening parties, from religious association and control.

Other topics I must pass over; but the friendly challenge about residence calls for an answer from one to whom it comes home. My answer is that were I a bachelor I should live in lodgings in Renshaw-street, but that conscience does not bid me make my wife and children live there.

The question really at issue appears to be whether our missions, conducted on the present lines, are worth preserving. After two years' work at one of them (in which work, let me gratefully say, my friend Mr. Barrow has always been ready with active help, as well as sympathy and wise counsel) my mind is troubled by no doubt or misgiving on that score. So far as my experience testifies, such a misgiving is more likely to intrude itself in other spheres of ministry. And therefore, having begun, and passed from youth to middle age, as minister of an independent congregation, I ask for nothing better than to end my working days as a domestic missionary.

A. W. TIMMIS.

XI.

I QUITE agree with Mr. Barrow in his protest against a "lock-up mission." When, some three or four years ago, one of our ministers went to live outside of his district and said he could get to any part of it on his bicycle in ten minutes, I replied, "but how about the poor people who hadn't a bicycle and urgently wanted your services at night when the mission would be in the hands of the caretaker?" In this matter I entirely disagree with my friend Mr. Bishop, it is my first disagreement with him in our five or six years, close intimacy and cordial working together in our Willert-street Mission; I know the surroundings of the mission house are depressing, but did not Travers Madge go and live, not only in the worst district, but in the actual homes of the poor; and did not Mr. Crossley, the wealthy engineer, leave his beautiful home at Bowdon, and go to reside in the centre of a Manchester slum? The same applies to Roman Catholic priests and the ministers and clergy of various denominations.

We are asked to abandon the Poor's Purse, or placing at the minister's disposal funds for meeting cases of distress that he is bound to meet with on his daily round of visits. Talk as much as you like, and condemn as strongly as you like indiscriminate almsgiving, but do not withhold money to alleviate the sad cases of distress that come under your minister's notice; but, if you did withhold it, he would only do on a larger scale what he is doing now, namely, go to his own larder for bread and milk and meat to help suffering families. Better let us make some mistakes rather than talk to these people about religion and "pass by on the other side" where their physical wants are concerned. In the name of religion I ask where does "I was hungry and ye gave me meat," "I was naked and ye clothed me" come in? You cannot carry on a mission without material help. I have always thought that a very great part of religion meant "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction," but surely it did not mean merely to look in upon them and say "be ye clothed," &c. It will be a bad day for our missions if, when our minister visits these wretched homes with empty grate, empty cupboard, and poorly clad children, he is unable to render help to the very poor in their pressing needs.

Mr. Barrow and others ask us to give up the various agencies that have clustered round our domestic missions. Well, to give only one instance, what would this mean at Collyhurst, in the matter of Sunday work. Dismissing 120 children who now attend a simple and interesting morning service, and 350 or 400 children at the afternoon school. It is impossible to calculate the extent of good that is being done directly upon these children, to say nothing of the easy access it gives to the homes of their parents.

Then you would close a bright and pleasant evening service taken part in by 100 or more; the choir composed of young men and young women belonging to the mission. But there are more agencies than these, which space and time will not permit me to mention. Now, instead of suggesting the doing away with such work, I would say, provide more suitable housing. The chapel is at the top of the building with a long flight of ugly and awkward stone steps, impossible for the very old and infirm and dangerous for children. Build a more suitable chapel on the ground floor, and many that cannot possibly attend now will gladly avail themselves of the benefit of the service. No, instead of giving up our little mission chapel, I would much prefer to sell one or two of our half-empty city churches, and with part of their large funds erect suitable buildings, and employ a second or assistant minister at Collyhurst, where there is an enormous field for such labour, extending to Harpurhey and other densely populated districts.

For many years I have again and again urged upon the committee of the Manchester Domestic Mission that the members should take an active, personal share in the work of the missions. First, I proposed that we should take it in turns, to visit the missions periodically, but this was a failure, as none of us ever got into touch with the work and it was abandoned. Then it was decided that we should have branch committees, i.e., some five or six members of the general committee be appointed to take charge of each of the missions, and a similar number of those workers who had grown up in the mission and were helping the minister in the different agencies he was carrying on. As to the success of that plan, none can know but those who were engaged in it. In Hulme it was taken up in a half-hearted way, and it languished and nearly died. At Collyhurst it only just escaped the same fate, in the first year; one meeting was held, we appointed our chairman, and were never called together again. The second year the committee was appointed, and we decided to have monthly meetings at the mission. This branch committee has been helpful to the minister in various ways, and was a great encouragement to the workers, and evidence may be seen in the aspect of the buildings and surroundings, which are now clean, wholesome, and sanitary, and the various institutions which are full of vigour and large in number.

Much can be done by our ministers in obtaining workers. I do not mean by speeches at public meetings or from the pulpit, or even in the press by general appeals, but by direct personal influence on the members of our congregations. We have had very important help from outside. One minister, in particular, sent us some admirable workers, although he had to build up in a short period a large congregation with extensive agencies connected. There is no part of my sixty years' work which I look back upon with greater pleasure than those few years in which I was associated with Mr. Bishop and those friends and fellow helpers who, after their day's toil, engaged in our deliberations until a late hour in the evening, and which was brought to a close by a serious illness and four score years.

A notable example of what may be done by working not merely for but with the people may be seen in that splendid organisation, the Wesleyan Central Mission. Twenty years ago it was one of our dying city churches with thirty or forty well-to-do worshippers. To-day, it is the centre of a great organisation ministering every Sunday in chapel, music-hall, and theatre to the religious needs of 15,000 people, and on week days through its fifteen social agencies influencing for good upwards of 15,000 more of the destitute, the afflicted, and fallen, in the worst districts of our city. Is it not high time that we awoke out of our long sleep, and throwing off our lethargy should, according to our means, opportunities, and numbers go and do likewise?

XII.

MR. BARROW'S paper was so full of serious thought and far-reaching suggestion that it must necessarily have caused stirrings of heart and mind in all those who heard or have read it. On the one hand those who know well what admirable work can be done and is done by our missionaries by means of the methods so deliberately criticised cannot help feeling fluttered lest that good work should in any way be checked or discouraged; on the other hand the glimpses given of deeps beneath the lowest deep of material and spiritual poverty touched by the missionary make one feel as if something more and better should yet be done. In this discussion I touch upon two points only.

(1) The indisposition of the poor to attend services in a mission church, and their sense of awkwardness can hardly be regarded as fixed and unconquerable facts. A missionary overcomes that sense of awkwardness, and all the accompanying feeling of distrust in a hundred cases. If there remain cases where he is permanently unsuccessful, those need not disturb him to any greater degree than any minister is disturbed who discovers that neither a Liturgy nor the absence of a Liturgy, neither earnest sermons nor good choir-singing are sufficient to make some of those people, whom for their own good he would like to attract, feel at home in the services. A missionary, like another man, has to be content to do something, keenly conscious all the while that it is not all that he wishes to do, sometimes not all he hoped to do. Some other man may break down a prejudice which he found invincible; in any case that prejudice is nothing special to one class of the population, it is only part of the general distrust which men still unchristianised and only partly civilised feel towards other men.

(2) The argument about residence might lead a man to reside in the prison as well as in the unwholesome court. Even in the court his life will not be like that of the poorest, unless he has a house with no passage through, and rooms so small and few as to make decent life impossible. And what boots it? His aim will not be to make people contented in a slum, but so to improve them that slum life shall be as intolerable to them as to him. Slums and prisons should be looked upon as temporary evils, not as ultimate conditions to which a man will conform in order to teach others how to endure them. After all there is no merit in descending into hell, much less in settling down there; the merit, if I read rightly, is in harrowing hell and fetching thence condemned but still salvable souls. If a missionary go on with his work faithfully, raising and helping such as are drawn to him, helping the better rather than the worse, those that are nearest him rather than those farthest off, he will do better than by swimming out of his depth, and endeavouring to speak to just those that have least capacity to hear. If those whom he affects for good can help those still further off, and for him inaccessible all the better. Holding these views, some of the objections raised by Mr. Barrow seem to me decidedly merits in our present methods.

DAYS OF CREATION AND THE GLADNESS OF LIFE.

II.

I HAVE been musing of late on those lines of Shakespeare in the play which are so wonderful in the power and sweetness with which they express this feeling. They occur in the lovely night scene at the close of the last Act of the Merchant of Venice; they are familiar to every lover of English poetry. But we may not have noticed—I had not before—how the three kinds of harmony, to which the soul may be responsive, are brought together there, in the rapt lover's spech. There is the harmony of music produced by human instruments; there is the sphere-harmony of heavenly orbs, whose motion is a kind of singing to the cherubim; and there is the inner spiritual harmony, which, for the poet, dwells in the soul, though rarely if ever heard on earth.

How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!
Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears; soft stillness, and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony.
Sit, Jessica: Look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-ey'd cherubims:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But while this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close us in, we cannot hear it.

Ah! yes, we can hear even that, sometimes, O Poet, and the rhythmic melody of thy words doth help us to hear, and hearing, to rejoice with thee!

The Happiness of Living Things.

But it is Nature herself—this actual world of law and life and love, that aids us most to feel the serenity and gladness of creation. The writings of a modern naturalist, which have so lately come to us from across the Atlantic, should be very precious, especially to town-dwellers, for the witness they bear to the happiness and harmony of life among the wild free creatures of the earth and air and waters: We have heard so much of the relentless cruelty of Nature, of the merciless strife and widespread misery prevailing among her children, that it is good to hear the other side, from one who has been a life-long student and lover of these. In his three delightful books, "The Birds of the Air," "The Beasts of the Field," and "The School of the Woods," Mr. W. J. Long has given us the results of many years' watching and recording in the virgin forests and by the lonely lakes and streams of New Brunswick. To turn his pages, and linger over the striking illustrations which beautify them, is to be carried away to places where Nature has been little disturbed by man and the fellowship of living things is still unbroken. The main issue of this writer's patient and loving observation is a conviction that a wonderful happiness and harmony of existence prevails there. Amid all the struggle and conflict, the preying of the strong upon the weak, the severities of climate and occasional scarcity of food, he finds an abounding joy in life, a freedom from care, from fear, and from prolonged suffering; so that to watch or to remember the ways and habits of wild creatures has become to him a deep and pure delight. One morning he had been observing two of these—an eagle that soared, hour after hour, high in the summer air, and a small turtle that was holding on to a stick, one end of which was sunk in the waters of a stream near the bank and was gently swayed to and fro by the motion of the current. The eagle swept round and round in great circles, sustained on outspread wing, in easy, joyous flight; the turtle swung in placid happiness, "rising, falling, swaying with the river's flow, glad of his little life, which was yet big enough to know pleasure, glad of light and motion, and, for aught I know, glad of a music in the stream below, the faint echo of the rustling, rippling, fluting music that filled the air and the woods around me. Life," he continues, "is a glad thing for the wood folk; that is what the eagle was saying, far overhead; that is what my little turtle said, swaying up and down on a twig at my feet; that is what every singing bird and leaping salmon said, and every piping frog along the shore, and every insect buzzing in the warm sunshine. And I remembered suddenly a curious fact, which till then had never come home to me with its true significance; in all my years of watching the wild things, watching, not to record or to make a story, but only to see and understand for myself just what they were doing, and what they thought and felt—I had never yet met with an unhappy bird or animal. Nor have I ever met one, before or since, in whom the dominant note was not gladness of living. I have met all sorts of beasts and birds at close quarters; some whose whole nature seemed bent into a question mark . . . . some fond, like a certain green frog that attached himself to me, with an affection that denied his cold blood; some foolish, like the fawn that would never follow its leader; some morose and ugly, like the big moose that first watched and then twice tried to kill me; but never a one, great or small, among them, to whom life did not seem to offer a brimming cup, and who did not, even in times of danger and want, rejoice in his powers and live gladly, with an utter absence of that worry and anxiety which make wreck of our human life." "Nature above and below tingles with the joy of mere living—a joy that bubbles over, like a spring, so that all who will, even of the race of men who have lost or forgotten their birthright, may come back and drink of its abundance and be satisfied." *

Men also must Rejoice.

I find it good to read of such things, as well as of things which the morning paper tells of, not always so cheerful and pleasing. It is good to know that a law which works for such harmony of joy is very strong in this world of ours—that it is in the heart of one who can write thus of its workings there, and in every heart that can respond to the gladness of nature and her children. For it carries the hope that this is what creation means for all, somehow, somewhere. It bids us trust that the purpose of creation must be the joy of human, as well as of other and, as we think, lower forms of its manifold life. The race of mankind is not disinherited, however it may seem to have sold its birthright of peace and happiness. For the world is a unity, and God is one, and His ways must be just and fair. He cannot have favourites among His creatures. The eagle soaring on high in the joy of its strength cannot be dearer to Him than the child playing in a slum court, or the child's mother toiling in a cellar dwelling, or the disheartened reformer, sad because he cannot yet win for these people worthier conditions of life. If no bird or beast is really unhappy, and only man is, that cannot be because they are elect and he is reprobate. It is that he is allowed to be unruly and wayward for a while that so he may learn the deeper meaning of that law which the other creatures obey with spontaneous wisdom. His trouble is a passing discord in the great harmony, not a break in the real continuity of evolving life. He too will learn the wisdom of living happily, and on a higher plane, and with a larger sense of the beauty and glory of the world. He will come to know and obey, with conscious willingness, that law of the whole, which lowlier creatures obey in unconscious surrender to the impulse or instinct of desire.

Perfect Summer Days.

Sometimes, on summer days, when the heavens and the earth attain to their highest splendour of light and loveliness and calm, the truth of life's deep harmony of joy seems borne in upon us from the very heart of nature. Even in England there are always some days of every year which, in their serene perfectness, seem meant to reveal to us the real significance of it all. The sky is filled with light; the woods are silent and shadowy; the green grass is radiant with sunshine; the fields of corn are slowly ripening their treasures of food; the bright creatures of the air and fields and waters live and rejoice; and God seems to be saying to us: This is what my creation means, this is an outward and visible sign of that life and love and joy of the spirit which My creatures must all know and possess. Beauty which the eye beholds, which the mind loves, is my gift, my smile, my benediction, in which you also, my human children, shall come at length to rejoice abundantly.

A poet of our own time tells us how one summer day, when his mind was troubled with the disappointment and imperfection of things, this truth came home to him. He had been complaining and murmuring to himself; he had said that nothing satisfies, because nothing is perfect. But—

> As I spoke, beneath my feet
> The ground-pine curled its pretty wreath,
> Running over the club-moss burs;
> I inhaled the violet's breath;
> Around me stood the oaks and firs,
> Pine-cones and acorns lay on the ground;
> Over me soared the eternal sky,
> Full of light and of Deity;
> Again I saw, again I heard,
> The rolling river, the morning bird:—
> Beauty through my senses stole;
> I yielded myself to the perfect whole.*

Summer in the Soul.

It is in such hours that the sure deep meaning of creation's endless work seems revealed to us; the veil is withdrawn, or becomes luminous to the soul's clear gaze; the real and the ideal are made one. And having felt this, we may go back to the homely duties of life, and mingle again with the sad confusions of the world, and toil at the problems and perplexities of human things; but we shall take with us, in our hearts, the thought that reconciles all, and the joy which belongs to the paradise of wise and far-seeing and exultant love.

And we may be assured of this, that he who has that thought and that joy in his heart is best equipped for life's most stern demands. To hear, to-day, amid the rancour of sects and the conflicts of opinion and the strife of tongues, amid the jealousies of nations, race hatreds, and the rage for riches, and the fierce fightings of men in great cities—to hear amid all this the eternal harmony of nature and of God, is to have greater grace whereby to maintain our sanity of mind and courage of soul, and to have more strength wherewith to do our work with patience, and to use what gifts of service may be ours, not without some effectiveness, in life's great onward movement—the creation of a world where love, controlled by reason and crowned with beauty, shall some noble make happiness possible to all.

LITERATURE.

BEATRICE BARMBY'S VERSE AND PROSE.†

THE publication, after her death, of Beatrice Barmby's "Gísli Súrsson" and Icelandic Poems and Translations told us that we had had a great poet amongst us. But her self-identification with Iceland seemed so complete that we wondered whether other sides of her nature were capable of catching the poetic fire and passion which burnt so intensely in these poems. The answer is contained in this second volume of poems, which shows us that her genius was as many-sided as it was intense. Taken as a whole, the first volume was a volume of achievement, and the second a volume of promise. The first surprised us with the knowledge of what we had gained, the second fills us with the sense of what we have lost.

The imaginative sympathy which enabled Miss Barmby to take her place amongst the poets of Iceland responded to other heroic themes. Those who have any acquaintance with the old French poetry, will have felt the spell of the mysterious figure of Charlemain, hundreds of years old, yet still swaying the destinies of men; and they will see how it had asserted itself in the mind of the poetess who could write in her "Ballad of Count Roland":

And towards Paris Charlemain
Through the night rode sick with care;
O'er his long beard privet-white
Swept his white locks dank with rain;
And about him in the night
Slowly in their sockets turned
His great eyes that ever burned
Cloudless with an unspent light.

The lover of Shakespeare's Sonnets will recognise in Miss Barmby's imitation (though it must be ranked rather amongst her poetic exercises than her direct poetic utterances), something more than mere echo.

I would that I had beauty for your sake,
And yet thank God I am not beautiful,
For peevish Time would me his plaything make,
And leave the bright edge of your fancy dull.

I would be subtle, keen as mountain air,
Fit to be mated with your master-mind,
But Time might steal this jewel from my care
Till you should scorn me that I lagged behind.

Alas! sweet friend, I have nor grace nor wit
Nor aught that dare your dear acceptance crave,
For all I have to give is nothing fit,
Save my poor love, which you already have.

But happier I—because I know indeed
Your love, like priceless sunlight, came unfeed.

The "Foiled Invasion" is the most imaginative of a series of poems dealing with the borderland on which Mythology, the personification of the powers of Nature, and Witchcraft blend:

There was not a flower nor a stunted tree
But was rife with poison and treachery;
And the victors cowered in their camp by night,
And the sentinel died ere the morning light.

The very sun when the daylight came
Was a poisonous ball of blood and flame,
And the victors turned and trembled and fled,
And the passes rang to their fugitive tread.

The volume abounds, too, with what one feels to be metrical experiments, which yet display a sense of music and a mastery of form that is past the stage of imitation. One of the most remarkable of them is the poem on page 50, beginning—

Now the wings of the wind come down.

From one point of view, the general impression conveyed by the volume is that of a poetic mind revelling in a wide range of literary and imaginative associations, and in soliloquy, affectionate or passionate, answering and echoing to the great voices by which it has been stirred. But through all there is the sense of original power, a power that presses for no recognition, but that is not afraid to recognise itself.

If it be God's own voice sublime
That fills my ears with ringing rhyme,
I will not shut them to the chime.

Nor dare I, though my dulled sense win
But struggling echoes faint and thin,
Blaspheme the pealing voice within.

Echoes are never mistaken for inspiration, and from end to end of the volume there is not a single case of derived emotion or reflected thought mistaking itself for experience and observation, or of description taken from books and not direct from nature.

Miss Barmby often feels two sides of a truth, and always feels them nobly. Thus on two opposite pages we have poems one of which represents the unreasoning rebellion of grief against the facts of life, hugging what it knows to be superstitions:—

Is it not strange
That love must beg the cast-off robes of Faith
To robe himself withal?

and the other, that strange acquiescence which feels so deeply that the terrible fact is true, that its truth becomes part of that eternal order of things which we cannot even wish otherwise

I would not grudge the life you gave,
I would not hate the heavens black,
I would not curse the rolling wave,
The winds that never cease to rave,—
Ah, God! I would not wish you back!

And amongst the Sonnets we have one in which the insecurity of the life that is built only on its own weal or woe is contrasted with the larger life of sympathy:

And so we garner up our love and hope,
Not in our petty granaries, where the thief
Breaks in and steals; but where the world expands
To such a vast infinitude of scope
As leaves no room for private joy or grief.

And another in which we are taught to look behind the spectacular or statistical aspects of collective life to the throb of individual hearts.

My heart was once as keen as children's are
For tales of loss, of struggle, of debate,
The crash of falling dynasties, the fate
Of nations, and the hideous noise of war.
The long parade of history, the jar
And bustle of our times, the conquered state
Struggling against those Powers misnamed great:
I loved them all as pageants seen from far.

But now I hear the units in the mass,
And now I see the atoms in the spheres,
How hearts must break to let the pageant pass,
How every triumph veils a nation's tears,
Sorrow tracks sorrow—as in Banquo's glass
Stretched out the cruel triumph of the years.

Dante is often made responsible for the sentiment "That there is no greater pain than to recall a happy time in wretchedness;" but few notice that the sentiment is not Dante's own, but is placed by him on the lips of a lost soul in Hell. The germ of her future misery was already contained in her joy.

Miss Barmby knows a better truth. In "Parting," she tells us (the italics are mine):—

Seeing the memory of true happiness
Is joy itself, and their delight was less
Than mine, who weened that misery's sharpest stress
Comes from the thought of dead joy overcast
By present sorrow—but the withering blast
Of keen regrets beats not upon my past.

It is probable that the majority of these poems were written without the smallest thought of publication; and every page shows that the writer was following her own thought or her own fancy, or trying the weight and swing of her tools, in perfect self-abandonment. It is the more remarkable that through every mood of tenderness and dramatic self-identification there is never a touch of feeling merely brooding over itself. In the wide range of sentiment there is never a note of sentimentality.

Miss Barmby tells us that it is only the "great dreamer" who "greatly acts," and the touch of reality is never absent from her own dreams.

I must conclude this notice with a single quotation from one of the nature poems:—

No wind can vex the quiet, and the rise
And fall of the slow waters on the beach
Metes out the hush, as often some soft speech
Deepens the more the silence when it dies.

I have left myself no room to speak of Miss Barmby's Prose Tales. They are full of varied vigour, and show great constructive power. There are four stories, and every reader will have his favourite. Mine is the Oriental tale, "The Slave of Lagash," in which a touch of Western sentiment is introduced with extraordinary skill. It is treated as a portent, and what came of it the authoress leaves untold. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

OBITUARY.

MR. I. C. THOMPSON.

THE news of Mr. Thompson's sudden death, on the morning of November 6, came as a painful shock to the wide circle of his friends. He was on the doorstep of his house in Croxteth-road, Liverpool, preparing to go out as usual, when the swift summons came to him. "His too early death," wrote Sir Oliver Lodge, in the Liverpool Daily Post, "in apparently full vigour of life, is a great loss, not only to Liverpool, but also to his department of biological science throughout the world. It will be still more keenly felt by the large group of personal friends who loved and admired his sterling personal qualities. In a quiet, unobtrusive way, he exerted a beneficent and harmonising influence wherever he was known, and the circle of his friends was annually growing wider. Happy in his family, and gifted till quite lately with excellent health, he might have been expected to withstand the attacks of time for many years; but he did not spare himself in the performance of his duties, and some recent strain must have told upon him more severely than his friends were aware of."

Isaac Cooke Thompson was born in Liverpool, July 27, 1843. His father, George Thompson, was in business as a chemist and druggist, and subsequently established the well-known firm of Thompson & Capper, homœopathic chemists. The father died more than thirty years ago, and to the end of his life Isaac Thompson was constantly active in the business of the firm. At the same time his life was devoted to scientific pursuits, and as a record of the high position he attained we cannot do better here than add to Sir Oliver Lodge's tribute, just quoted, passages from a longer letter of Professor Herdman's, in the same issue (November 9) of the Liverpool Daily Post:—

"There were few of our local organisations for the advancement of science and the applications of scientific teaching in which Mr. Thompson did not play a prominent part. Although fully occupied as an active man of business, with many concerns on his mind and hands, he found time to help on good work on very varied lines. Few men had more appeals for lectures, for papers, for help in organising, for his services (which were always highly valued) as hon. treasurer of funds, as member of council or committee; and never in the experience of some of us were such appeals made to him in vain. On the occasion of the last visit of the British Association to Liverpool, in 1896, Mr. Thompson was one of the local secretaries, and his colleagues can testify how well he did his share of the hard work, and how much the success of that great meeting depended upon his admirable business arrangements and careful attention to detail.

"In earlier days he was prominent in organising the association of local scientific societies, which held an annual gathering in St. George's Hall, and for many years he was one of the most active members of the Microscopical Society, and an ardent field-naturalist and an accomplished microscopist. His position at that time in the local scientific circles was fitly indicated by his selection in April, 1882, to attend Darwin's funeral in Westminster Abbey as the representative of the Liverpool scientific societies.

"In later times he was one of the founders of the Biological Society, and of the Liverpool Marine Biology Committee, and it is in connection with the latter, and during the last twenty years, that most of his original scientific work on the copepoda has been done. It has long been a characteristic feature of English science that really distinguished work has come not only from those professionally engaged but also from serious amateurs, men who have the scientific spirit and training, but do the work solely for the love of research, and for the interests and beauties of nature which their investigations reveal. This has been especially the case in natural history: and Thompson was one of these serious amateurs who did good work of lasting value. Like Dr. George Johnston, Alder and Hancock, Hincks, H. B. Brady, and Gwyn Jeffreys—to mention only a few of those who preceded him—Isaac Thompson made contributions to our knowledge of the marine fauna, which, taken with the memoirs of these other amateurs, constitute one of the glories of British zoology."

Professor Herdman then gave further particulars as to Mr. Thompson's work, and concluded:—"It is in connection with the Liverpool Marine Biology Committee investigations, the dredging expeditions in the Irish Sea, and the work in the laboratory at Port Erin that the present writer has been brought into the most intimate relations with his friend, and has learned to appreciate not only his scientific knowledge and skill, but also his honest, fearless, upright character, and his sympathetic, loving nature. The loss to science is great, the loss to Liverpool of the man doing his duty nobly and full of good works is greater still, and of the loss to those who were privileged to enjoy his friendship or to be united with him in still closer ties it is impossible to speak."

Isaac Thompson was born a member of the Society of Friends, in which his mother was a recognised minister, as his sister Frances Thompson still is. During the ministry of the late Charles Perry, however, more than twenty years ago, and through intercourse with him, Mr. Thompson became a decided Unitarian, and a member of Hope-street Church. Latterly he had been connected with the Ullet-road Church.

The funeral service, before cremation, was conducted by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

1 CORINTHIANS XIII.

"If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am become sounding brass, or a clanging cymbal."

IN the Book of Acts there is an account of a meeting of the disciples at the time of the Jewish feast of Pentecost, when, we are told, "they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and they began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." This, had never happened before in their meetings and they believed it to be the Spirit of God speaking through them.

It is difficult to know exactly what it was; but once when I went to a little Methodist chapel in the country, I seemed to get some idea of what it was like. I sat beside an old man, who was entirely absorbed in the service, and, at intervals, in the prayers or the sermon, he made exclamations, quite loud, such as "Amen!"—"Ah!"—"Oh Lord!"—or "Glory!" He seemed quite unconscious that he was saying anything, and no one took any notice; and other people in the chapel did the same thing. I wondered then whether the "Gift of Tongues" was not something of the same kind.

In the verse above, I think we learn that Paul felt that the disciples were getting to think too much about this sort of gift of a fervour which must be spoken; and he tells them that though this may be a good gift if anyone is there to interpret the meaning, it is nothing at all worth having unless there is a much geater gift besides—the great heart of Love. If they give themselves up to expression of feeling of any sort, without the deep feeling behind, it is only the outside, like the sounding of brass or the clashing of cymbals. If they have the Love which is the greatest thing in the Universe, other gifts may follow as God wills to give them; but without Love they are worth nothing, and will not influence anyone.

And by Love Paul does not here mean any special love for any special person, but the large and gentle and loving heart, ready to help and sympathise with every one of God's creatures. No one had so large a share of this Love as Jesus had. When he spoke, the people felt that "never man spake like this man." Why was that? Not because he was a great orator, but because his speech was simple, and he spoke of the things they saw and knew and understood, the lilies, the sheep, the mountains, and all that God had made. His speech went right home to their hearts and made them love him in return.

Think how he called the children to him and took them in his arms, when people thought they would only trouble him; how pitiful he was to the sorrowful and mourning; how he helped everyone, and how good he was to those who were penitent. In all these ways the great Love of which Paul spoke showed itself, and far more plainly than in any "tongues," whether "of men or of angels."

There is a story of a poor woman who had done something very wicked; and some of the Scribes and Pharisees brought her to Jesus, saying to him that for the sin she had committed the Jewish law would condemn her to be stoned to death; "but what sayest thou?" they asked. At first Jesus did not answer, and seemed not to hear; but when they went on asking he looked up, and saw the poor woman and the eager cruel faces round her; and then he said "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone." They were "convicted by their own conscience," and went out, one by one. When Jesus looked up, all were gone; only the woman remained. He said to her, "Where are these thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee?" She said, "No man, Lord." And Jesus said, "Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more."

We do not know any more about her story. But how she must have felt his loving and pitying spirit, so different from the Scribes and Pharisees! His words and his Love must have gone straight to her heart.

And, children, only think to how many of our hearts those words must speak, "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone." We are so eager to find out faults in others, so quick to reproach them—to cast the first stone—forgetting that we have done as wrong things also, and are not "without sin." Where now is our Love? We may be clever, we may be learned, we may have faith, and be able to do great deeds that need courage and strength; but where is the large-hearted love that feels for another, and can put itself in his place? "If I have the gift of prophecy, and know all mysteries and all knowledge; if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing." No, our conscience convicts us; we are not without sin; we may not cast the first stone; we go out, ashamed, and leave our companion alone with the Love which feels for him and which we have been too unkind to feel And if we are really "ashamed," we shall never again try to cast the first stone.

A big boy at school had done very wrong, and had also led younger boys to do the same. He was a clever, eager boy, and one whom the younger ones admired and followed gladly. He was found out in his fault, and the under-master talked to him very severely, and told him what his punishment would be. He spoke well and strongly, but the boy stood upright before him with a hard cold look; he said nothing, and nothing seemed to touch him. He moved about restlessly, and wished he might go. He knew he had done wrong, but he was not sorry; and he only felt angry with the master for all he said. He dreaded his punishment, but intended to go through it manfully. Later in the day the headmaster sent for him. He was rather frightened, as he had a tremendous respect for him. He opened the door timidly, when told to come in, cast one glance at his master, and then stood still, waiting, with his eyes on the ground. What was coming? What would he say? The boy was almost trembling now. The master came up to him, put his hand on his shoulder, and looking in his face said gently, "My boy, what were you about?" John was sixteen, but in a moment he burst into tears. There was no more to be said. His proud heart had met with that great Love that can "remove mountains."

EFFECTIVE MINISTRY.

THE paper on "City Churches and the Theory of Independency," read by the Rev. CHARLES PEACH at the recent meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Manchester, is published in full in our present issue, and we would ask for it the serious attention of all who have the welfare of our churches at heart. It furnishes a clear statement of an urgent problem affecting the common life of our religious community, and makes a suggestion of the highest practical importance, which we earnestly hope will be taken up as it deserves, for the consolidation and strengthening of our work.

How an effective ministry is to be maintained in city churches, from which the greater number of old adherents have removed into the suburbs, and connected themselves with other churches there, is the immediate question which presses for an answer, and in offering what we take to be the true solution of practical wisdom and religious faithfulness, Mr. PEACH opens also a wider question, and shows a way by which the work of our churches as a whole, both in town and country, may receive a fresh impulse of life, and enter with good hope upon a wider field of effective service.

Churches are starved, the energies of ministers and people are wasted in often hopeless struggles over the question of finance, where the old resources are no longer forthcoming for the maintenance of a separate ministry for each church. What, then, shall we do? asks Mr. PEACH. These city churches can still do a work of genuine religious ministry among the people remaining within their reach, there are groups of humble folk who still look to them as their religious home, and it is a shame to abandon the field. So we may say also of not a few churches in country places, where formerly the presence of one or more wealthy families prevented any serious anxiety in the matter of finance, but now that support is no longer forthcoming. The day of independence in the enjoyment of a separate ministry for such congregations is gone by, and it is well that the miserable struggle to maintain an incompetent man on a pittance should cease. The right solution of the difficulty, which Mr. PEACH has clearly pointed out, is in the wiser distribution of our forces, making fuller use of capable ministers and calling a larger body of auxiliaries into the field.

That means, the enlistment of a new force of lay-preachers, both men and women; but it means also an appeal to our churches as a whole for a deeper sense of fellow-feeling, so that the stronger may more adequately help the weaker churches, and more fully share their privileges together, and for a deeper sense of responsibility in the members of each congregation for the maintenance of that fellowship in worship and union in common work, in which the great end of their existence is to be found.

The first practical suggestion which Mr. PEACH makes is that where there are two city churches, neither of which can adequately maintain a separate minister, they should federate their forces, under the superintendence of one minister, who should preach alternately in both churches, and arrange for the other services with lay help. The same suggestion will apply to any two or three little country churches which are near enough together, and if the churches in the union of their district associations will work out a scheme and secure an adequate force of lay preachers, we believe that it will be found not only an immense relief to sordid cares, but a great gain in the quickening of religious life among our people.

That is the point on which the chief stress ought to be laid. The financial suggestion is marked by practical good sense, but the religious appeal goes much deeper. It is a call to service addressed to our people as a whole, to realise, as too often they have not done in the past, that they themselves are the living church, that the work of ministry is in their hands, as a worshipping people and as workers, whether they have a specially trained minister at their head or not, and that it is a trust laid upon them to maintain the true spirit of worship and all the energies of practical beneficence which centre in the church. If there is supposed to be sacrifice on the part of a congregation in not always having a fully trained minister in the pulpit, let the sacrifice be gladly made, and the spirit of prayer and service be made to minister in the common life of the people the more truly on that account.

Mr. JAMES BEARD pointed out in the discussion on Mr. PEACH'S paper that this principle has a still wider application, and that where people remove from the city beyond the reach of their old churches, and find no other in the suburb to which they remove, they should yet form fresh groups of worshippers, even where there is no possibility, for a time at any rate, of establishing a new church with a settled ministry, and so should maintain the essential life of religious fellowship, there in the new districts, as it is to be maintained within the city which they have left.

On the subject of lay-preachers we shall have something more to say next week; here we desire simply to call attention to Mr. PEACH'S paper, and to lay stress upon the one point that it is a call for new life in the churches themselves, on the one side for greater independence of religious activity; on the other, for closer co-operation and the fuller use of all the forces for a helpful ministry which we have at our command.

RELIGION IN THE DAY SCHOOLS.

IN discussing last week the position to be taken up by liberal Christians when the time arrives for a final settlement of the question of religious education in our public elementary schools, we laid it down as common ground that, assuming that the State continued to supply virtually the whole of the funds for the maintenance of the schools, and so became entitled to take their management and control completely into its own hands, it could not employ its appointed teachers to give instruction in the tenets of individual denominations, and those teachers must be appointed without reference to denominational distinctions. The rate-payer and tax-payer must no longer be compelled to pay for the teaching of a theology opposed to his own, and the public school teacher must no longer be required to profess conformity with the tenets of any sect as a condition of his taking service under the State. On the other hand, we took it as common ground also that it was desirable that we should teach in our schools the elementary ethics of CHRIST—the love of God and man—common to all the Christian sects and to most earnest-minded men outside the sects, even to many self-styled Agnostics—always provided that this could be done without injustice to, or without creating too keen a sense of injustice among, our fellow citizens.

But that ideal will be enormously difficult to attain—first, because, in the case of great numbers of teachers and managers, something more than pure theism must, with or without intention, inevitably be added to the instruction given, thus immediately creating manifest injustice to parents or ratepayers whose views do not coincide with this theological superstructure; and, secondly, because, even if the ideal could be strictly followed, there are those who would contend, justly or unjustly, wisely or unwisely, that the teaching so given was prejudicial to the further theological instruction they desired to give to the children of their own denomination. Moreover—and this is a point not referred to last week—there would be logical difficulties in justifying the public endowment even of pure Christian Theism if those members of the community who refuse to affirm the existence of the Deity, or actually deny it, chose to declare that they had a conscientious objection to the use of their money for such teaching, or if similar objections were raised by Jews or others who refuse to JESUS the first place as the exponent of Theism which Christian teachers would inevitably give him.

Supposing, then, that religious teaching in schools under the authority and at the cost of the State is found to be impossible, what is the alternative to be aimed at by men of liberal religion? Two plans are pressed upon us. One is, that the State should invite the sects to undertake, in the school buildings, and inside or outside school hours, the theological instruction it cannot impose upon its own servants; and the other, that it should itself organise "moral instruction" as distinct from instruction in religion or theology. We cannot profess ourselves enamoured of the idea of inviting the sects to carry their warfare into the people's schools with the State to "keep the ring," and see fair play. The people's schools should be places where the children are taught, not that which divides, but that which unites. Men will differ in their theology as long as the veil remains which separates the known from the unknown, and the children must learn these differences as they mix in the world with their fellows. But it were a thousand pities that such controversies should be forced upon them, with an insistence out of all proportion to their relative importance, every morning of their young lives as they turn into class-room A for instruction in one theological system, while those who are their class-mates and play-mates through the rest of the day march into class-room B for instruction in another. At least, we must resist the demand that these sectional theological classes shall be carried on during the hours of compulsory school attendance. That would be frankly intolerable. If permission to use the school buildings for this purpose out of school hours be found really to help in composing our differences—which we are inclined to doubt—the plan may, at least, receive our careful consideration. But the thing must be done out of school hours, and the task of gathering the children in must be undertaken not by the State, but by the denominations concerned, on their own responsibility and initiative.

We come to the other alternative of "moral instruction." It would be sad indeed were the children debarred from being taught at school their duty to themselves, to each other, and to their country, because their elders could not agree upon the precise nature of the religious sanction upon which that duty rests. It may be doubted, however, whether a programme of daily lessons based only on the last six commandments of MOSES and the second of CHRIST, would be received with any great enthusiasm either by the religious world at large, by the teachers, or by the scholars. If once religious education be ruled out, it would probably be better to rely for the dissemination of sound morals upon the general tone of the teaching through the whole "secular" curriculum, and the good use made by the teacher of such opportunities for pointing a moral as are constantly afforded in the study of history, science, and literature, even in its most elementary stage.

"Secular" education is not an attractive phrase, and we should be sorry to see our elementary education made "secular" in the bald meaning of the term. But the kind of education we have in mind would be very far from merely secular in this sense. After all, the chief value of religion lies in its practical application to the daily affairs of life, and a religious minded teacher will have his influence for good upon his pupils, whatever the curriculum by which he works, while the work of the man who teaches without such an impulse will be largely barren, even if he belong by profession to the most right thinking religious society. Let us improve the conditions of the teaching profession and improve the training of its members, and so obtain the help in this work of those best fitted for the most noble of the liberal professions, and our teaching, whether "denominational," "unsectarian," "moral," or "secular," will make inevitably for the uplifting of the people.

THERE is one feature in the work of the new mission settlement of the Congregationalists at Pentonville that must be particularly interesting to Sunday-school workers. The Claremont Chapel had fallen into decay with the shifting of a residential population, and had remained closed for some time, a monument of desolation to all passers by, until it was re-opened and worked under Rev. F. W. Newland in a way more suited to the changed habits of the district. It was decided, with a boldness that justifies itself, that the Sunday-school should be confined to children over twelve years of age. We are constantly talking about the difficulty of retaining our elder scholars. May the institution of a school that is only for elder scholars contain a suggestion by way of answer to our perplexity?

CITY CHURCHES AND THE THEORY OF INDEPENDENCY.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES PEACH.

IT was in this city, and not far from where we are now assembled, that Dr. Parker made his impassioned appeal to the Congregational Churches to rise out of the isolation and weakness of their traditional Independency into the unity and strength of an organised church. The problems with which he dealt, and the arguments he used, all sounded familiar in the ears of a half-dozen Unitarians gathered in the gallery of the Free Trade Hall that day. For in the matter of church order and government, we have become identical in our methods with our Congregationalist friends. The old tradition of the Presbyterian origin of some of our churches only survives in the name of our local Association and in the priceless heritage of freedom which we owe to our honoured ancestry. In practice our churches have become Independent, and the Independency of our adoption is as ill suited to the needs of city life as is the Independency of their inheritance.

Independent Churches.

I am not now going to discuss the theory of Independency; I am not going to try to estimate exactly how much "Presbyterianism," as generally understood, there was in our old Presbyterian churches. I am going to take the simple popular conception of Independency as it works out in general practice; and then I am going to suggest that it is a hindrance to our proper work in the great centres of population to-day. Independency as thus understood means the sufficiency and completeness of each little group of worshippers for all the functions of a Christian church. The little group is the church and the Union is a Union of churches each complete in itself. From this it follows, in practice, that each little church must have a minister of its own. Thus the parish of the minister is the little group of persons to whom he is indebted for his call and with the masses of people who may live near his church he has no special relations at all, except perhaps as a missionary to the unconverted.

Now while we have never adopted this as a theory, it has been largely forced upon us in practice in consequence of historical circumstances. We have been compelled to organise our churches wherever we could gather our adherents and without special relation to the exact spots in which they might be planted. That was all very well so long as our churches merely provided for a particular type of spiritual culture and took no part in the general work of evangelisation of the world.

Changed Conditions.

But two things have happened in recent years, and they are, I submit, the controlling factors in the situation to-day. The first of these is the drift of our old adherents from the cities and towns out into the country; the second is the growth of parochial agencies and functions in connection with our churches themselves. By some gracious dispensation of providence the comparative emptiness of our churches on the Sunday which often leaves us disheartened is compensated by the crowded state of most of our Sunday-schools, by the teeming agencies which fill up all the nights of the week, and by the readier approach of unchurched working men to our ministers, as compared, I think, with those of other denominations, when in search of help or guidance in the problems and cares with which they are concerned.

What are we to do?

This, then, is the problem of many of our city churches. Our congregations are going or gone—gone to found new churches elsewhere—but our real work remains. What are we to do? Are we to sell up our city properties so as to follow our people out into the cleaner air of the suburbs? That were a consummation devoutly to be wished, if it were consistent with our duty to the Gospel itself. But to do so would be to make the cynical avowal that we have no part or interest in the religious culture of the masses. For while most of our Manchester congregations have suffered heavily in the way I have named, there remain some tens of thousands of people still living in close proximity to our several churches. Have we any mission to these people? To put it another way, "Are we just little groups of spiritual eclectics, or are we a church sharing in the common commission of the church to preach the Gospel to all mankind?" I cannot doubt as to our answer. The common people heard our Lord gladly, and our belief in the primitive purity of our Christianity is not worth much if we despair of a like ready hearing to-day. But whether we may be heard or not; whether we may gather working men into our churches or not, the actual work that we are doing remains. Every one of our churches justifies its existence, I believe, by the services it renders to the neighbourhood in which it is placed. I know of many churches here which are centres of light, homes of peace and comfort, sources of inspiration, and real helps in the lives of very great numbers of people. Indeed the closing of any one of our churches would inflict a serious if not irreparable moral injury on the neighbourhood in which it is placed. It would, in short, be a gross betrayal of our responsibilities and it would stultify our faith in the brotherhood of man.

Overtax of Ministers and Churches.

What then remains? Simply this. We cannot abandon our work; but we must adapt our methods to its changed conditions. Now what is it that threatens the permanency of our work? what is it that makes it so extremely difficult for our churches to hold on after our old families have moved away? Is it anything else than this old theory of Independency; the pitiful confession that no church can continue to exist without the whole time of a separate minister devoted to it, or else that our churches have not got sufficient in common with each other to federate together for the purpose of pastoral oversight? Let me say frankly it is the intolerable strain of a separate minister for each little congregation that is threatening the permanency of our work in the city churches to-day. And in saying that I am not reflecting either on the ministers or the congregations. Our congregations tax themselves as heavily as they can be expected to do; our ministers half starve themselves—mentally if not physically—in order to hold on. Indeed it is not the parsimony of our congregations but the extravagant and unsatisfactory use of their gifts which humiliates me. I want to see our churches initiating agencies of social amelioration, bearing a fuller share in the redemptive work of religion, but on every hand we are handicapped and crippled for want of funds.

Federate the Churches.

My suggestion, then, is this. Let us federate our churches for common work under a common pastoral oversight. Let us come out of our isolation and group our churches together, in twos or threes as circumstances may determine. Let us develop the lay agencies in our churches; let us make our ministers leaders of bands of fellow-workers, and not leave them, as they too often are now, solitary preachers to "hearers of the Word." There is no group of churches to whom this suggestion should come so naturally as ours. We are the least sacerdotal of all the churches in theory, but we are the most sacerdotal in practice. We never forget to remind our ministers that they are not priests, but we always shrink from sharing in their duties as if they involved priestly functions. It would be life to our churches to get our laymen at work in our pulpits. We lose our best men simply because we do not find work for them to do. There is no laity in Christendom better fitted or so little occupied in the service of the churches as that of the Unitarian community.

Crippling Burden of Finance.

With the drift of our old supporters into the country and the consequent straightening of our finances, our churches are beset by a fatal temptation. They are apt to think that the first essential is the raising of money and to give themselves to that to the neglect of their proper work. There are churches amongst us whose thought is almost wholly occupied with this question of mere self-existence. Special services are conceived of as opportunities for special collections; the minister becomes an organiser of variety entertainments, and the minister's wife is only distinguished from a hard-driven sempstress in that she is not paid for her incessant toil at sewing meetings and at home preparing for eternal bazaars and sales of work. These are the alternative expedients to which our churches are driven and they are not good. Moreover they defeat the end they have in view. An occasional bazaar for a forward movement or for genuine special work is usually helpful to a congregation, but perpetual bazaars year after year merely to keep the church doors open are apt to suggest the inquiry, "Is it worth while maintaining an institution which more and more withdraws itself from its work and gives its energies to mere self-preservation?" And so the few supporters left in our city churches, able and willing to work and give, grow fewer, and the strain is greater than ever.

New Method Essential.

Now I hope this does not sound pessimistic. I am very far from being disheartened. We have good workers left with us in all our churches, and most, if not all, of our churches are doing splendid work. It is the greatness of our opportunity and the importance of our work which makes me most anxious to indicate, in its incipient stages, a danger which if unchecked will drain the spiritual life of our churches and destroy their power for good work. Because this tendency of our people to remove into the suburbs is one which cannot be checked. It will grow stronger and stronger. It is, I think, a natural and inevitable consequence of the growth of our great cities. But the masses of the people who must be near their work will remain. Are we going to neglect them? Are we going to abandon the field to the great Wesleyan Missions of whose splendid work I only say that it does not meet all the requirements of our times. If we are going to remain, we must have a definite policy, suited to the conditions of our times. The policy of drift is of no use. It is of no use to leave our churches to struggle on on the old lines, more and more limiting their aggressive work, more and more absorbed in the struggle for survival until, finally defeated and despairing, they are bound to give in. We are now, as I have said, in the incipient stages of this difficulty. It is not yet too late to meet it and overcome it; but it will be too late if we wait until our churches have become quite submerged in the struggle to meet new difficulties with the old methods, and to maintain the old standard of expenditure with a greatly diminished income.

Something more than Finance.

I do not want to go more closely into the financial question. I am advocating the grouping of churches under one pastoral oversight because of the spiritual quickening which it would, I believe, produce, by the development of lay preaching, in our churches; and I merely indicate the financial difficulty as the immediate practical necessity which will probably compel us to review our theory and practice of Independency. I recently had an opportunity of examining the balance sheets of most of the churches in our Manchester Association. There was only one of those churches which had paid its way during the then current year. The reports accompanying the balance sheets in nearly every case spoke of this as a serious state of things. And it is serious; but its seriousness is here, that we are in danger of devoting a disproportionate amount of attention to our balance sheets. A church does not exist for the sake of its balance sheet, and it has not necessarily justified itself even if it has closed the year with a balance in hand. But we must give this attention to our balance sheets if we are going to maintain the old methods. Because, of course, we must meet our expenses or else cease to exist. The only alternative to perpetual and increasing worry over ways and means is to reduce our expenditure in the way I have indicated and to turn the thought of our respective church committees from problems of finance to plans of work. There is not much that is very inspiring in the ordinary meetings of our church committees to-day. The dark cloud of ways and means hangs over most of them, and it is hiding the sunshine of our Gospel and the glory of our work.

Appeal to Laymen.

Ministers are not business men. We are told that too often not to know it. You laymen are. I put it to you, therefore, as business men, this the business side of the question. Will you face the problem? Will you look ahead? Is this drift of our people away to the suburbs a fact? How can you meet the financial consequences it involves save by yourselves coming to our aid; by yourselves taking such a share in our work as will make possible the grouping of, at least, two of our city churches under each minister; by yourselves becoming not merely our paymasters but our comrades in the work.

For our ministers I have no special claim to speak; but I venture to say this on their behalf that they would give a fair hearing to the discussion of any such plan as I have suggested; that they would not be deterred by any additional work it might involve; that, on the contrary, they would hail any scheme which would end the discussion of ways and means as a very emancipation of the better spirit of our churches which is now too often crushed out by the mere machinery of finance. It is not work which wears out our ministers, it is worry, and nine-tenths of it is worry over the wretched question of pounds, shillings, and pence.

Objections Answered.

My time only allows of a simple and crude statement of the case. I have no time to argue it. In conclusion let me anticipate one or two objections. First to those who think my diagnosis of our condition in the great cities is wrong, I only say if these conditions do not apply in your case then I do not urge on you this remedy. But these conditions do obtain in some cases I know of.

Others will object that this is an age of specialisation; that the day of the lay preacher is past; that only specially trained men will be listened to. To which I reply, "Religious experience can never be the product of specialisation, and by the very nature of our profession we can never make any distinction between the real qualifications of ministers and laymen.

That the newer adherents whom our churches serve to-day should maintain them is an objection which ignores the facts of the case. It is simply impossible for them to do so on the old methods, and the number of our churches actually self-supporting and not subsidised by the dead or the living is extremely small.

Finally, it may be said that we could not get the necessary lay help. I do not believe that. For now nearly twelve months I have been responsible for the regular supply of three little chapels in addition to my own. I have depended almost exclusively on laymen; but although in each case a journey of over thirty miles each way is involved, yet those services have never failed once.

Share the Work of Ministry.

In making these suggestions, then, I am not deterred by any practical difficulties which I can foresee. I believe a modified circuit plan would work with us as it works with the Wesleyans. I believe we shall be forced to it, or worse, in the case of our city churches. But it is not the practical necessity merely or mainly which induces me to make these suggestions. It is a profound conviction that ultimately the life of a church as a spiritual institution depends on the readiness of its members to serve it and to bear their testimony for it. We are weakened to-day by our dependence upon our ministers. Our religious life would become deeper, finer, and more real if more of our leading laymen would only come at times into our pulpits and tell us what religion means for them, how it helps them, and how the sense of a divine purpose in life lends to all their tasks a sacred meaning and lifts all their labours from mere sordid drudgery into divine service.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE series of last week's Autumnal Meetings in Manchester was concluded on Thursday morning by a Conference of the Sunday-school Association.

A service of devotion was conducted in the hall of the Lower Mosley-street schools by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, after which the chair was taken by Miss Marian Pritchard, President of the Association.

The PRESIDENT, in her opening address, said their Association was born in 1833, and two years afterwards a printed report told of an annual meeting held in London. In those days the Association was made up of six schools, four in London and two in the country—in Wiltshire and Sussex. Not until 1839 did Manchester come into the Association, but it came in as a worker and formed a depot for the books of the Association, and in 1840 there were statistics of two of the schools of Manchester. It was pleasant to know that of the two schools one was Lower Mosley-street. From the beginning the aim of the Association had been to strengthen the schools and to raise the ideal of the teachers. In later years, perhaps, the most delightful manner in which they had striven to do this was by the Oxford summer meetings, and she was glad to be able to say that they would have the privilege of going there again next year. Their great point was their literature, and she wished especially to call attention to the periodical literature for the practical help of teachers.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, the hon. secretary, made an encouraging statement with regard to the operations of the Association and the literary work done by it in London.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON read a paper on "The Responsibilities of Church and School towards each other." He defined the church as consisting of a number of men and women bound together by the common tie of a desire for public worship of God, for the cultivation of their own spiritual life, and for the help and service of their fellows. The first recipients of our care and attention should naturally be our own young ones whom we gather into our Sunday-schools. If any church is called upon strenuously to support the Sunday-school it surely must be the one whose congregations, for the most part, advocate the sound educational principle:—The knowledge that is agreed upon by the nation to be taught by the State; that upon which the nation differs to be taught by voluntary agencies. The first call upon every congregation is to provide a teaching staff, and the necessary income for the work of the Sunday-school. Religious education is not merely the committing to memory certain doctrinal statements as to God and our relation to Him, not merely the familiarity with the words of one particular book however beautiful; but the encouragement in the soul of the child, already eagerly receptive of such impressions, of the sense of deep affection and kindly care with which it is surrounded, and the gradual drawing of these higher emotions of the child's soul up to the greatest affection of which the human soul is capable, the love of God gained through and by means of the love of man. Members of the church should visit the school and show a kindly interest in teachers and scholars. The school should lead by a natural and definite transition to the church and its membership. The entrance into membership of a Christian church on the part of any young person who has had the right training at home or in the Sunday-school, ought to be a solemn religious act, and yet there wa no religious community of which he had knowledge which made that act, at least in outward form and expression, a more distinctly secular one than our own. Entrance into membership should be made an act of religious and conscious choice, and not a mere payment of money. The young people should be made to feel that while they are desired to support the church and its institutions to the best of their power, both with time, ability, and money, the only test of membership required of them is that of their wish to take a part in the common worship and work of the church. Mr. Robinson thought that the guilds met a real want; in them Sunday scholar and church member met, and the one gradually merged into the other. In them was the nucleus of the solution of the problem of the proper relation between the church and the school. Their borders needed widening until they included every member of the church and every senior scholar of the school; and then the distinction and name of the guild could be abolished, and there would be one communion of the seekers after truth, those who have felt the love of God and who desire to learn yet more of it by their devotion to and service in the cause of their fellow men.

Mrs. MANNING gave an address on the same subject from the school point of view. The relation of church to school, she said, should correspond to that between parent and child. The true parent is not neglectful of the moral and spiritual atmosphere needed. It is said that the Unitarian Church does not attract young people. It lacks the ritualism of the Roman Church, and the prestige of the English Church. Are the young people from our Unitarian homes at church with their parents, or playing at golf and tennis? The Sunday scholars do not find their way into the church. As they grow older they either go to no church at all or to that of another communion. She did not believe that Unitarianism had no attraction for the young. Based as it was upon absolute freedom of inquiry, it alone could meet their needs when the old systems of thought were crumbling away. Were we failing in our methods? We have no creeds, no catechisms; but was it right that our teaching should be so colourless with regard to belief that a child should think there was no difference between that and what it was taught in the day school? If so, there was no wonder that when it grew up it should see no reason why it should go to a Unitarian church. Mrs. Manning asked for more Bible teaching from a Unitarian standpoint. One Unitarian believed in the miracles and another did not; but that did not matter, so long as the methods adopted were rational. Would not the rational teaching of the Bible give them an influence over the mass of the people? If they taught it candidly as lovers of truth they would find an enormous increase in their numbers, and in the influence of their churches. It was not for the sake of the Unitarianism of Channing or of any other individual man, but for the spirit which animated them all, the spirit of absolutely free inquiry, and candour in every question which comes before them. Commending the admirable teaching in our schools of the cardinal virtues, in which she thought they were specially strong, and which in our hands tended to the production of better citizens, she questioned whether we sufficiently impressed on our young people the need of prayer and of worship, of great reverence for everything sacred. She knew no school which was adequately supplied with teachers. We had amongst us a number of young men and women of leisure and culture who should be working in the Sunday-school; but parents often put obstacles in the way. The young people say they would teach history or science but could not teach religion; yet if they were encouraged by their parents, they would find that the task would become easier. This Sunday-school teaching would interest them in the life of the poor. They would go to their scholar's home in a case of sickness, and a longing would at last come to do something more to help in the moulding and directing of young lives in less advantageous conditions than their own, and so they would become workers in our great city problems. If Unitarian parents fully recognised their responsibilities to their children the Sunday-school difficulties would cease.

An interesting discussion was carried on by Mr. Wigley, Mrs. Howarth, and the Revs. J. H. Rossington, W. G. Cadman, T. P. Spedding, L. Smith, and W. H. Burgess.

THE man who finds not God in his own heart will find him nowhere: and he who finds Him there will find him everywhere. The reason why men are so often disappointed in their search for God is, that they do not look for Him first of all where He should chiefly be sought—in the manifestations He makes of Himself in their own minds and hearts. They suffer the noises of the world to drown the "still small voice" that never ceases to plead with them to keep in the path of righteousness and peace.—David Swing.

THE NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting was held last week at Leicester, and was inaugurated by a conversazione on Tuesday evening (Nov. 10) at the Great Meeting schools. A large number of guests were received by the Chairman of the Vestry (Mr. A. H. Paget) and Mrs. Paget, amongst those present at the formal welcome to the Association being Mr. J. Harrop White, of Mansfield (president), the Revs. E. W. Lummis, H. Gow, W. G. Price, Peter Dean, W. Stoddart, J. K. Smith, W. Whitaker, E. I. Fripp, and J. M. Lloyd Thomas (hon. sec. of the Association), and a representative gathering of local friends. A cordial welcome was offered to the Association by the Chairman, who shared the hope of the committee that such a gathering would help to bring the churches into closer touch one with another, and be a fitting prelude to what they hoped would be a successful series of meetings.

Mr. J. H. White, President of the Association, then gave a stirring address. Never in the history of Unitarianism was there a greater need, he thought, for personal consecration to the work than at the present time. Sometimes he had almost a feeling of despondency when he thought that the century had made such a bad start. He was bound to say he did not see much to encourage them. They seemed to be living in an age of low ideals, and of comparatively small men. If they took literature, art, or the drama, where did they find men occupying distinguished places who were doing something to uplift the human race? Speaking of the drink question and the spread of gambling, the speaker said that horse-racing and football were doing much to encourage the latter evil. There was a call to everyone at the present time to uplift the low ideals, and it was for Unitarians, who, if they stood for anything, stood for the brotherhood of men, to attack these social evils. He felt they were not doing their duty with regard to social questions at the present time. Time was when they were in the forefront, but now they were allowing other bodies to beat them. They had a simple and rational faith to teach, which should attract those who were repelled from other churches. In conclusion, he urged the claims of their scattered churches to help and sympathy.

On Wednesday morning a religious service was conducted by Rev. E. W. Lummis, in the Great Meeting, when the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. H. Gow.

BUSINESS MEETING.

In the afternoon the annual business meeting took place, the PRESIDENT in the chair.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas presented the annual report.

The report stated that the past year had been unusually full of incident and activity. The financial position of the Association was unsatisfactory, and unless the funds could be increased the work would have to be curtailed.

The position of the trust relating to the Lincoln Chapel had for a number of years been a source of anxiety, and several attempts had been made to put matters on a proper footing, but without success. The one surviving trustee had, owing doubtless to some misunderstanding as to his position and the intentions of the committee, declined to appoint additional trustees or render accounts. It was with much satisfaction that the committee were now able to state that this undesirable condition of affairs was at an end. In 1902 the committee took the opinion of a well-known equity counsel, and, acting on his advice, they, in conjunction with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, approached the members of the Lincoln congregation with a view to legal proceedings. An application was then made to the Charity Commissioners by Messrs. Arnold Wilkinson, Brooke Revitt, and Joseph Fletcher (three of these members) for authority to commence an action against the surviving trustee. On this authority being given proceedings were taken against that gentleman with the concurrence of the Attorney-General. The plaintiffs and the committee's representative were met with the utmost frankness by the defendant's solicitors, and in the result accounts of the trust estate and of the dealings with the trust funds were duly submitted for investigation, and eleven additional trustees were appointed.

There was now a yearly income of about £150 available towards a minister's stipend and general chapel expenses. It was confidently expected that ere long a minister could be appointed to succeed the late Mr. Revitt, and that the chapel, which had been closed for upwards of a year, would be re-opened. The committee expressed their obligations to Messrs. Wilkinson, Revitt and Fletcher, for their courtesy and help in this matter, and their indebtedness to Messrs. Langtry & Tweed, of Lincoln, the solicitors to the trustee, for their assistance in bringing a long-standing difficulty to a satisfactory termination. They also wished to record their thanks to Mr. Franklin Winser and the Rev. J. Kertain Smith for their timely services, and also to Mr. J. C. Warren for his unremitting interest and invaluable work both in his private and professional capacity.

The report and the balance-sheet presented by Mr. B Dowson (treasurer), showing an increase on the year in the balance due from £31 7s. 10d. to £45 5s. 3d., were adopted. The officers of the Association were re-elected, and the new committee appointed.

After tea a conference was held, the President again occupying the chair. The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS read a paper on "An Imperial Church," in which he projected a scheme for the establishment of a church built upon the broadest and firmest foundation, coincident in extent with the British Empire, which, though a complex unity, he claimed to be a real unity. In reply to the query, Why restrict the church to the British Empire? he said by all means let them work towards the erection of the world-wide Church of Humanity, but let them support every effort that sought to realise it in part. The creation of an Imperial Church would not only be the accomplishment of a great part of the larger task, but also the best possible preparation for the remaining work. With regard to other objections, he thought the unwillingness of many possible helpers to extend their active interest beyond the limits of their own congregation was a sore obstacle in the way. Never in all history had such a church so rich an opportunity as their composite Empire presented, and he contended that such an Imperial Church as he propounded was quite practicable.

A discussion followed, in which Miss Clephan, Rev. W. G. Price, Rev. W. Whitaker, Mr. T. W. Belfield, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and others took part.

Mr. Lummis replied, and a vote of thanks to him and to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

MANCHESTER THEATRE SERVICES.

THE third and concluding service of the present series in the Manchester Palace of Varieties was held last Sunday evening, when a congregation of more than eighteen hundred people assembled. The Rev. J. Page Hopps conducted the service, and took for his subject, "Six things we are all sure of." The great certainties of religion, those which all alike feel who have any religious feeling at all, these were what he spoke of: that we should content ourselves more with the real inspiration and enjoyment to be obtained from them, without troubling about the minor matters which divide us. If we are wise we enjoy to the full the fresh air and sunshine which are granted to us. Why should we not live in the conscious sense of the great realities of religion?

Mr. Hopps spoke earnestly of his hope that the services would be resumed in the near future. There can be no question that the attendances have shown that a real want exists among those who apparently cannot be persuaded to attend "respectable" religious institutions. Competent observers have agreed that only a comparatively small proportion of the audience was composed of those attending Unitarian churches already, and inquiries made result in the assurance that comparatively little difference has been observed, except in some of the church choirs, upon the attendance at the Unitarian churches in the neighbourhood. One congregation, that of Pendleton, was an exception, the evening service having been closed for the three Sundays.

Some criticism has been directed in Manchester against the choice of the particular theatre in question by the committee. The result has amply justified their choice. The building is an attractive one, comfortable and roomy, well lit and handsomely decorated, and a large audience can hear the speaker with the greatest ease. The entrances and exits are numerous and well planned. The effect when the large congregation stood after the closing hymn at each service, and sang reverently the "Lord's Prayer," was most marked. The singing, led by a large choir of eighty voices, conducted and accompanied by Mr. Oliver H. Heys, was hearty and well sustained. At the closing service Miss Blanche Mackie, of Burnley, sang the solo, "Hear, O Israel" (Elijah). This was the only departure from the customary form of service usual in our churches.

Naturally the preparation and conduct of these meetings necessitated a large amount of work, which was managed by a sub-committee of the governing body of the Manchester District Association. Mr. Richard Robinson, to whose work in this connection we alluded last week, tells us that to the Chairman of the Committee, Rev. W. R. Shanks, was chiefly due the eminent success which has attended its labours. Among other activities he personally superintended the distribution of 100,000 leaflets of invitation to the services. Besides these leaflets, which contained a few sentences written especially by Mr. Hopps, 3,000 of the pamphlets of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and 3,000 notices calling attention to the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches in the Manchester District, were distributed among the audience.

The collections taken at the door amounted in all to about £28. A voluntary band of stewards, numbering from forty to fifty, each evening rendered splendid assistance. The general question heard as the audience left the theatre on Sunday was, "When will these services be resumed?"

The numbers attending the services at the Grand Theatre, Islington, also show a steady increase. Last Sunday, when the service was conducted by the Rev. James C. Street, a congregation of about 700 was present.

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

THE subject of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's third lecture, delivered in Nottingham, on Monday last, was "The Christ of Paul: Spiritualised Judaism." The large attendance of the preceding week was well maintained, and among those present were some of the leading Free Church ministers of the city.

Mr. Carpenter opened with a high estimate of the character and work of Paul. But for him, Christianity could hardly have emerged from its apocalyptic form. It was he who saved it from being a mere sect of Judaism, with Jesus as Messiah. Paul was the champion of liberty, the author of the high phrase, "life in the spirit," the great missionary, the organiser of the early Christian communities as well as the advocate of their unity and organic connection as members of one body. He was, moreover, a thinker of extraordinary force and daring.

In studying the apostle's views of Christianity, we had the inestimable advantage of having his own words, and not, as in the case of the sayings of Jesus, the reports of others, and translations from another tongue. The lecturer accepted the Epistles to the Thessalonians, Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans as authentic, and fixed as their dates 51–55 A.D. Philippians, Colossians, and Ephesians were more disputable. He had no doubt as to the first; the second had large elements of genuine Pauline material, but the third was most doubtful. These he placed 61–63 A.D. The pastoral letters were admitted by most scholars to have been largely edited, and they certainly contained elements of a later time.

Having called attention to the occasional character of these writings, the lecturer proceeded to describe the cosmological background of the apostle's thought. He lived in a world of seven heavens that rose in successive tiers, and were occupied by good and evil powers—angels, thrones, dominions, principalities, &c. Paul believed that once he had personally been caught up into the third of these heavens. His world was one subject to a divided sovereignty: over against God stood the realm of Satan.

The apostle fully shared the views of the early Church as to the resurrection, judgment, and second coming, and even in the last years of his life he still cherished some of these apocalyptic hopes.

Great stress was laid on the personal peculiarities of the apostle's religious experience, culminating in his conversion. This inward crisis, which changed the whole current of his thought and being, connected itself naturally with Jesus rather than with God, because it was Messiah that filled his mind and imagination. Paul had not had personal intercourse with the earthly Jesus. His Messianic dignity was deemed to be established by his death and resurrection, not by the miraculous birth or the incidents at the baptism. For Paul, Christ lived at the right hand of God in the spiritual world, and was identified in the apostle's thought with what might be called the Ideal Man. This "Heavenly Man" was believed to have pre-existed in some radiant form of spiritual being. This thought was by no means unfamiliar to the Jews, some of whom held it in a far firmer and more concrete form than that presented to us in the Platonic doctrine of Ideas. In this connection, the lecturer quoted a most interesting and significant saying of Enoch, to the effect that every soul was created eternally, before the creation of the world. Christ, through God having raised him from the dead, was really restored to his pre-existent glory, freed from all earthly limitations. The earthly life of Jesus, the Jew and Palestinian, was thus the entry into natural humanity of the pre-existent "Heavenly Man." This act of voluntary humiliation and surrender for the sake of the redemption of man excited the apostle's rapturous gratitude and devotion.

But, however exalted the prerogatives which were assigned to Christ, the sole final power resided in the Father, who alone could be called God; and in that ultimate victory over the powers of evil, the Son himself would resign his authority to the Father, "that God may be all in all."

We are glad to hear of increasing attendances at these lectures at Lewisham and Richmond also.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Rhyl Street Domestic Mission.—A Girls' Club has been established at the Mission, and a room specially furnished for its use, but a piano is still greatly needed to complete the equipment. If any friend has a small cottage or boudoir piano, and would be willing to devote it to this purpose, kindly communicate with Dr. Read, at 22, Willoughby-road, Hampstead, N.W., or at the Mission.

Bolton (Unity Church).—On Tuesday evening Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave one of his delightful miscellaneous recitals before a large and influential audience. The subjects were taken from Shakespeare, Dickens, Ben Brierley, Edwin Waugh, Arnon, and others.

Burnley. — On Monday evening, at the weekly meeting of the Unitarian Literary Society, the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, delivered a lecture on "Robert Burns." In a very racy address Mr. Scott hit off some of the chief aspects of Burns' poetry. He said that whilst some people believed that Burns' popularity would soon wane and disappear, he thought otherwise, and he believed his message was as much for our day and for our time as for the day in which he lived. Burns was many-sided, but his special theme that evening was the poet's message for the twentieth century. He believed that the main trend of his teaching was reality. It was often said that Burns was not a religious man, that he scoffed at religion; but he quoted extracts from Burns' poems to show that it was only the cant and hypocrisy which characterised so many professors of religion against which he directed the shafts of his satire; and that for the realities of religion, purity, kindness, reverence for all created things, low as well as high, for nobleness of character, whether found in peer or peasant, he had the profoundest regard. The lecture was embellished with many sallies of wit and touches of pathos. Mr. Scott was heartily thanked for his lecture on the motion of Mr. David Harrison, of Padiham, seconded by Mr. J. S. Mackie, and supported by Mr. James Rowley. There was a large and appreciative audience.

Colne.—The second of a series of pleasant Saturday evenings was held last week under the auspices of the "Ladies' Guild," and was an unqualified success. Songs were rendered by Miss Wilson (Wesleyan) and Mr. J. H. Brigge (Churchman) of Colne. Recitations were given by Miss Eccles, and selections on the gramaphone by Mr. R. H. Eccles, B.A. (Congregationalists, of Lower Darwen, members of Mr. McGee's former Church). The proceeds amounsed to over £5.

Garston (Opening of Iron Church).—A public meeting was held last Monday on the opening of the new church. Mr. A. S. Thew, President of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, was in the chair, and among those present were the Revs. W. J. Jupp, J. Harwood, J. C. Hirst, C. Harvey Cook, R. P. Farley (missionary), H. D. Roberts, Mr. W. B. Bowring and Mr. C. W. Jones. Rev. H. D. Roberts stated that the church now opened was, by the generosity of good friends, free from debt. The president recalled the history of the movement and its progress during the past six years, of the services in the Co-operative Hall, and the pleasure it was to meet the Garston congregation on this auspicious occasion. The Rev. W. J. Jupp welcomed the congregation, and impressed upon them the feeling of fellowship with the other churches in the district, who were all in hearty sympathy with them. Mr. W. B. Bowring described this as his Parish Church, and was glad to note the progressive movement. Rev. J. C. Hirst (who has helped in the building up of the congregation) congratulated them on what had been accomplished. Mr. Charles W. Jones, the Revs. C. Harvey Cook, J. Harwood, and R. P. Farley also spoke.

Glossop.—For the second year in succession Glossop has a Unitarian Mayor and Deputy-Mayor in the persons of Captain Partington and Councillor H. Partington. Once more the Captain has made a courageous stand for the right of private judgment in matters of faith by attending service in his official capacity, at Fitzalan-street Unitarian Church. As was the case last year, his action has aroused a good deal of adverse comment, and a number of public officials absented themselves from his "Church Parade" by way of protest against the innovation. But in spite of very dismal weather there was a large and thoroughly representative congregation, numbering about three hundred, and nearly all men, last Sunday morning. Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox conducted the service, and spoke on "The Vision of Dry Bones." A collection in aid of the church funds realised close on £12. Local Unitarianism has just lost a staunch and true friend in Mr. Wright Booth, who died on October 31. He was one of the pioneers of the movement in Glossop in 1871, the founder of its Sunday-school in 1872, and up to the time of his death its sole superintendent. He came to Glossop from the neighbouring village of Mottram, where also he had been a zealous and devoted worker in Church and school.

Great Yarmouth.—The inaugural meeting of the Old Meeting Social Union, recently formed for the social, intellectual, and religious welfare of the members, was held in the upper schoolroom on Thursday week, and was a great success The Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., president of the society, took the chair, and gave a cordial welcome to all present. A programme of readings, music, and selections on the phonograph gave much satisfaction.

Lewes.—The election of Mr. J. H. Every, a well-known member of the Unitarian congregation, as Mayor of Lewes has given widespread satisfaction in the borough. Mr. Every is universally respected, and has made it abundantly evident that he has the well-being of his fellow-townspeople at heart. Mr. Every is the largest employer of labour in the town, and his relations to his employes are not limited to what Carlyle calls the "Cash nexus." Connected with the works is an institute where the workpeople can have games and baths and access to papers, and where, during the twelvemonth, concerts and lectures of a high order are provided. Last Sunday morning, the new Mayor, accompanied by the members of the council, attended service at his own place of worship, when an appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Felstead, showing how God was best served in the service of man. The service throughout was pervaded by an earnest and reverent spirit, which, it is to be hoped, left a not unhappy impression upon the minds of some in the audience who were then present in a Unitarian chapel for the first time. A few weeks ago Mr. Every presented to his minister a copy of John Morley's "Life of Gladstone" (an example worthy of imitation elsewhere). He has also presented a copy of the same work to the Lewes Free Library.

London: Stamford-street Chapel.—A conference of Sunday-school teachers and Band of Hope workers, under the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, was held on Saturday evening, November 14. Refreshments having been served, the meeting was opened with prayer by Mr. Thomas Paxton, and Mr. H. G. Chancellor, who was in the chair, explained the purpose of the meeting—to establish a better relationship between the Sunday-schools and Bands of Hope. In spite of the fact that an enormous amount of work has still to be done to stem the tide of increasing drunkenness, especially among women, Unitarians remained extraordinarily inactive and apathetic. He sincerely hoped that the conference would have a sensible effect upon the London Sunday-schools. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards then read a paper on "Temperance." He explained at the outset that he suspected he was in a similar position to Newman Hall, who, on being invited to the Metropolitan Tabernacle to have a go at the students, found that there was only one non-abstainer there. Reviewing the enormity of the drink traffic and its attendant evils, he stated his opinion that if the three and a half million children now in Bands of Hope could be kept under the abstinence banner King Alcohol would be dethroned in thirty years. What could teachers do to weaken and remove this terrible scourge? Cease to use it. By this simple, quiet abstinence a silent protest would be made more effective than pulpit or platform orations. No man has a right to form habits which injure his neighbour. No man liveth unto himself. It is good to refrain from that which causes my brother to stumble. He appealed to them to recognise the evils he had tried to describe and to join with others in seeking to remove them. The Goliath Drink could not stand if the Christian Church unitedly went out to meet him. Every Sunday-school teacher should abstain from that which blights childhood at every step. On some fixed day temperance principles should be taught in the Sunday-school and discussed from every point of view. He appealed to them on behalf of the children. In the discussion which followed, some interesting speeches were made, and attention was called to the opportunity provided by Temperance Sunday, November 29, for a clear declaration of principle. At intervals during the evening a musical programme was rendered by the Stamford-street Band of Hope and Mercy Choir.

Park Lane: Wigan.—A very successful bazaar on behalf of the Shaw Memorial Schools has produced a total in receipts of over £700, which is be further augmented by a small sale of work to be held in connection with the New Year's congregational tea.

Rochdale.—The current number of the Monthly Messenger of the Blackwater-street congregation contains the following announcement:—"We referred briefly last month to the approaching tercentenary of the birth of Rev. Robert Bathe, ejected Vicar of Rochdale, and founder of the congregation which now worships at Blackwater-street Church. Mr. Bathe died in March, 1674, aged 70 years, and although the exact month of his birth is not now known, it is generally considered as being early—probably January—in 1604. Assuming this to be so, and the date is bound to fall within the first quarter of the year, January next will mark the tercentenary of his birth. It is fitting that the occasion should be commemorated, and that the celebration should be in the old home of local Nonconformity. It will be gratifying to the congregation, therefore, to learn that Mr. Richard Heape, whose interest in Nonconformist history is well known, has written to the committee offering to place a marble tablet in the church to the founder's memory. A suitable inscription, based on the statements of the historians of the period, has been prepared, and the work is entrusted to Messrs. Hems & Co., of Exeter. The offer has been very gladly accepted, and a sub-committee has been appointed to consider the best method of carrying out a celebration, which, while it primarily concerns our own church, may also be regarded as of interest for the general Nonconformist community of Rochdale."

Walthamstow.—A course of Unitarian lectures are being held in various parts of the town during the winter season. The second of the series was given on Tuesday evening, Nov. 10, by the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., of Little Portland-street Chapel, his subject being "The Nature of God and His Method of Revelation as viewed from the Unitarian Standpoint." The lecture was highly appreciated by those present. Although the attendance up to the present has not been what we should desire, it is gratifying to observe that the lectures are attracting a few thoughtful people who at present are strangers to our faith.

Whitchurch.—The Church of the Saviour has sustained a great loss in the death of Mrs. Groom, at the age of 43. She had been a member of the congregation from the time of its formation, except for an interval when she left the town, and was earnest and indefatigable in all the work of the church and Sunday-school, with untiring zeal, patience, and kindness, and was ready to follow as well as to lead. She was also known and loved for many acts of unwearied kindness to those who needed the personal services she was generous in rendering. Her activity continued till the early part of the summer, when her strength began to fail, and on Thursday, November 12, she passed quietly away, to the service of the higher life.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—Particulars of the bazaar to be held in the Leeds Town Hall next week, in aid of the funds of the Union, are advertised in another column. The following congregations are taking part in the bazaar:—Mill Hill (Leeds), Holbeck, Hunslet, Bradford, Idle, Pudsey, Sheffield (Upper Chapel and Upper Thorpe), Stannington, Dewsbury, Hull, Rotherham, Doncaster, Halifax, Huddersfield, Elland, Lydgate, Pepperhill, Malton and Selby. Contributions of goods and money have also been received from members of the Scarborough and Wakefield congregations.

In this book an attempt has been made to get nearer to the meaning of the original by omitting some passages now held by many students to be interpolations, and also by first comparing several translations in order to select that word or phrase which seemed to convey the truest sense. It is hoped that by this means the great beauty, and wonderful teaching of this ancient masterpiece may be brought more clearly before the notice of the general reader.

ADVERTISEMENTS 790

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

TO-MORROW is Temperance Sunday, and we have received from the organising secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association a list of thirty-one of our churches in which special reference to the subject of temperance is to be made. In other churches this has quite recently been done, or will be done on an early Sunday.

THE discussion of "Missionary Aims and Methods" is concluded this week by Mr. Barrow's reply. We hope next week to publish Mr. Worsley Austin's paper, read at the autumn meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Manchester, and on December 12 Mr. Emmanuel Thomas's paper on "A Church of the Present."

WE are glad to see that the North and East Lancashire Mission is following the example of the Manchester District Association. The first special meeting of friendly visitation to the churches of the district was held at Burnley, and the second, as advertised in our present issue, is to be at Leigh this day week. We trust that the churches of the district will take full advantage of this opportunity of mutual helpfulness.

THE Dean of Westminster's Tuesday morning lectures on St. Luke's Gospel, given in the Jerusalem Chamber, and attended by about fifty clergymen and other ministers, were concluded this week. The Rev. Frederic Allen, who has attended these lectures for several sessions, expressed at the close the gratitude of those present to the Dean, and his own special pleasure, as a Nonconformist, in being present. He was seconded by the Rev. G. Sadler (Congregationalist), and Dr. Armitage Robinson, in acknowledging the thanks accorded to him, said it was a great pleasure to him personally to have those of different opinions and communions meeting together within the walls of that ancient Abbey, and to feel that, underlying their differences of thought, there was a bond of unity to be discerned in these meetings for the study of that which was in the interests of Christian truth. He then gave the benediction, and the proceedings terminated.

WE would ask the special attention of our readers to Mr. Dowson's letter, in another column, on the libel action Bayliss v. Coleridge, the result of which we briefly recorded last week. We should be sorry indeed if our note did any injustice to Mr. Coleridge, for whose work as an opponent of Vivisection we have the warmest sympathy. What we intended to express was our serious regret that such a mistake had been made as could hardly fail to damage the cause we have at heart.

AT the same time, as Mr. Dowson points out, the trial has thrown instructive light on matters of vital importance, and the question, particularly, of the supposed necessity of demonstrations in class on the living animal ought not to be lost sight of. In this connection a letter addressed by Mr. Stephen Smith, M.R.C.S., to the Daily News, seems worthy of attention :—

> The law forbids a demonstration on living animals before students unless "absolutely necessary." The experiment over which the action arose is very simple, and the underlying theory very easy to comprehend. Sir Victor Horsely and others informed the jury that the demonstration was necessary. This bold assurance has caused hearty laughter among my medical friends, including those with no anti-vivisection bias. I am not maintaining that such demonstrations are either right or wrong. I merely draw attention to the kind of evidence which a vivisector can call up when he needs it.

As to Mr. Coleridge's damages, the £2,000 has been paid, but many friends of the cause are determined that the loss which, with all the costs, is estimated at about £5,000, shall not fall upon him personally. Mr. William Watson made the first suggestion of a fund in the Daily News, and this has been taken up throughout the country. By Thursday the Daily News Fund amounted to £145 5s., in gifts ranging from £20 to 1s., and it was also stated that Mrs. Everard had sent Mr. Coleridge a cheque for £1,000.

A THOROUGH-GOING condemnation of certain modern modes of religious thought, from the pen of Dr. Forsyth, Principal of Hackney College, has been appearing by instalments in the Examiner. In this lecture, which is entitled: "Our Need for a Positive Gospel," Dr. Forsyth opposes his conception of Christianity to the tendency of the hour which presents it as the religion of the heart republished on a higher plane, as natural religion spiritualised, as the latest result of a sensitive and romantic psychology.

> Its Christ differs from other men, not in kind, but in degree. . . . We cannot begin with our soul and the light there, as Channing said we must, but with Christ's soul and the grace there. A positive gospel takes its stand on Christ, not as man's soul writ large, but as God's soul writ small.

DR. FORSYTH likes the influence of Sabatier no better than that of Channing. He objects to a religion that is "evolutionary, impressionist (subjective even to being feminine), and institutional." He traces all these influences, the greater emphasis that is laid on human nature and its possibilities, to the growth of the democracy of Rousseau, whereas what we need is the democracy of Calvin. It is probably fair to state Dr. Forsyth's position as thus :—that the possibility of human nature is simply that of being redeemed. The one article of Christian faith is: "Forgiven for Christ's sake." The whole article is worthy of careful consideration, because the writer is a courageous thinker, and has the gift of stating his argument in terms of unflinching decision. It is interesting also as the protest of one who is fully conscious that he is fighting against forms of thought that are becoming more and more prevalent among the orthodox churches. The humanism which he distrusts is increasingly the religion of those whose fathers, or certainly whose grandfathers, were Calvinists.

IT is cheering to know that out of fifty-one prisons in England and Wales only six are without lady visitors. Indeed, we may hope that the number now is less, for we quote from the official report for 1900. These visitors up to that year had worked singly, with but little help from communication one with another, or knowledge of each other's work. But in 1900 was formed the Association of Lady Visitors to Prisons, whose aim, informally stated, is "to become, as it were, a witness to the reluctance which is rightly felt by free men and women to deprive a fellow-creature of liberty, and, while recognising the justice of the penalty, to endeavour to utilise it by timely counsel and help."

It is surely difficult to think of a vocation for women which makes larger demand upon the individual worker than this. The enterprise of an explorer, the devotion of a missionary, and the patience and skilled watchfulness of an astronomer, the personal purity and self-forgetting love of a Christ-like spirit, a balanced judgment, a resolute will, and shrewd commonsense, these are some of the qualifications of an ideal prison visitor. And who is sufficient for these things? Yet one is thankful to learn that many men and women are thus witnessing, on behalf of the whole Church of God and of our common humanity, to the principle "that punishment should be remedial and reformatory as well as deterrent in its aim and character." They are witnessing, these men and women, to the love which our ideal humanity feels to those who have made shipwreck of life, in spite of the fact that they have injured our humanity in that shipwreck.

A VERY clear and eloquent paper, setting forth the aims and principles borne in mind by the members of the Association referred to above, was read by the Duchess of Bedford at a conference of Prisoners' Aid Societies, held in Manchester at the end of October. With a candour which many philanthropic workers might imitate, she tells us that, in the work, their hopes are often dashed, there are many disappointments. But, with a noble optimism, she adds, "A principle on which we rely is that a steady consistent witness to light and love must be carried into the dark places of the earth and maintained there. Whatever be the outcome of our work, we maintain that there is such a thing as social reparation, and that we are bound to make it."

IT is only within a very few years that women visitors to our prisons have been recognised by the authorities. Permission was granted to ladies who desired to undertake the work, but they had to make their own experiences, they rendered no account of their proceedings, they got no encouragement. All female convict prisons were closed entirely against visitors until 1895; but in that year the suggestion contained in the report of the Royal Commission on Prison Education, that lady visitors should be appointed, was acted upon. Yet in all the years since Eliazbeth Fry so nobly led in the work there have never been wanting a few volunteers who have gone "not only to those who wanted, but to those who wanted most." Mrs. Aingell, Sarah Martin, Miss Antrobus, Felicia Skene, and many more have carried on the tradition, and their faithful successors, with a better standpoint for work, are labouring diligently in the field to-day.

WE quoted recently from the speech of the German Emperor, on the occasion of the confirmation of two of his sons. On the following Sunday, statues of his parents, the Emperor and Empress Frederick, were unveiled in Berlin, near the Brandenburg Gate, and at a subsequent banquet the Emperor made another speech, recalling the memory of his father and mother, and for that purpose adopting the written words of an old family friend, the Geheimrat Hinzpeter. The Emperor and Empress Frederick, he said, entered on their life together at a period marked by great movements of thought and life, at the dawn of a new and richer time for Germany. They were both inspired by the new ideals; as none other, they were filled with dreams, thoughts, and plans, courageous to leave behind the old and take hold of the new, filled with hope and confidence for the future. Among their contemporaries they were distinguished by the intimate spiritual fellowship which united them, by their zeal and enthusiasm for new and loftier aims for the freer development of all powers and the richer unfolding of the national life. It was an idealism of lofty flight, and while their career was cut short by a cruel fate, they stood now as representatives of the new generation, at the head of a new line of emperors, who had a higher and more difficult task than the old line of princes and kings, demanding a stronger idealism for its accomplishment. They represented the enthusiastic youth of the German Empire, the inspiration of that culture which must give soul to the life of the people.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S last "International Book Circular" (No. 137, price 6d.) opens with a biographical sketch of Harnack, by Dr. W. F. Cobb, and with the "Circular" is enclosed a reproduction of Kownatzki's portrait of the famous Berlin professor. Adolf Harnack was born May 7, 1851, at Dorpat, in Russia, where his father was professor of Pastoral Theology in the University. Thence the young student went to Leipzig, and in 1879 became professor of Church History at Giessen. The first volume of his great History of Dogma was published in 1885. In the following year he received a call to Marburg, and in 1889 to Berlin. In concluding his sketch of Harnack, Dr. Cobb speaks of him as belonging to the "Middle school of theology" in Germany, and as standing for freedom of thought in all that concerns Church history and Christianity generally. And he concludes:—

As James Martineau did more to influence clerical thought in this country than any other Englishman of his day, so Adolf Harnack has done more to influence it in the Teutonic peoples than any other living man. From his Seminar in Berlin he is sending out every year men who are carrying his ideas not only through Germany, but far beyond its borders. His influence is as healthy as it is wide. Of him it may be truly said, "Nihil tetigit quod non ornavit."

AMONG Messrs. Williams & Norgate's announcements we are glad to notice a substantial work by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, "An Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel" (demy 8vo, 528 pages); Mr. Travers Herford's "Christianity in Talmud and Midrash"; and an English translation of Professor Jean Réville's "Liberal Christianity: Its Origin, Nature, and Mission," to be included in the Crown Theological Library.

I CARE for myself. The more solitary, the more friendless, the more unsustained I am, the more I will respect myself.—Charlotte Brontë.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN FRANCE.

"LA REVUE CHRÉTIENNE" for November contains several interesting editorial paragraphs under its Review of the Month. One of these refers to the Free Churches of France, which M. Puaux regards as the vanguard of French Protestantism. He quotes this admirable ordre du jour voted by their recent Synod held at Clairac:—

The Synod of the Free Churches of France, having considered the duties of Christ's disciples in respect of the world, being convinced that none of the Christian Churches has its end in itself, and being pursued by the idea of the Kingdom of God, declares that the place of every Christian is wherever any effort is being made in favour of justice, of brotherhood, or of liberty; thinks with cordial sympathy of all who, outside any ecclesiastical body and even outside of any religious belief, hunger and thirst for justice; and, awaiting the day when all men of goodwill may extend to one another the hand of fellowship without giving up any of their private convictions, appeals to Christians who claim to be worthy of the Reformation, and urges them to prepare measures which will cast down the barriers between their Churches, and facilitate fraternal collaboration in the service of God in humanity.

Other paragraphs deal with the attitude of the Roman hierarchy towards the author of "L'Evangile et l'Eglise," and the liberal Catholic movement. In 1678, the great Bossuet obtained the seizure of Simon's work on the "Critical History of the Old Testament," and thus, the editor declares, "destroyed a scientific movement of which France had the initiative and the honour, leaving foreign countries to take its direction." Now, by the same spirit, "cardinals, archbishops, and bishops" have prohibited the reading of the Abbé Loisy's work in their dioceses. Yet this was written as an historical defence of Catholic beliefs against the Protestant criticism of Harnack and others. Although a second edition of "L'Evangile et l'Eglise" has been withdrawn on the eve of publication, the Abbé has not been silenced. He has just published a reply to his detractors under the title of "Autour d'un Petit Livre" (Paris, Picard, 3 fr.). No one, says the Revue Chretienne, "can read this book, written in such noble language, so rich in clearness of ideas and pervaded by so proud an irony, without recognising in its author at once the scholar (le savant de race) and the man of conscience.

The Fathers of the Vatican supposed when they issued the placet which made a poor mortal into an infallible doctor of truth, that henceforth the age of controversies was over, and that they had sealed the tomb of liberal Catholicism. No! Never in any time has freer and more learned teaching been heard than from this priest, who in his rectitude and loyalty has recognised and affirmed that certain Catholic theses were no longer defensible.

The writer proceeds to point out that the movement which this volume represents is of even greater consequence than the struggle of the Republic with the congregations. "The most profound revolutions are not accomplished on barricades, but in thought The old ecclesiastical and philosophical edifices are deserted when the spirit which raised them dies in oblivion and abandonment. Such is the profound crisis through which the religions of authority are passing to-day."

UNIVERSITIES AND THE STATE.

"If our present University shortage be dealt with on battleship conditions, to correct it we should expend at least £8,000,000 for new construction, and for the pay-sheet we should have to provide (8×£50,000) £400,000 yearly for personnel and upkeep."—Sir Norman Lockyer's Presidential Address to the British Association, September 9, 1903.

IT is hardly necessary, at this time of day, to justify the claim of higher education for State support. The claim is recognised in the maintenance of the British Museum, of the National Gallery, of the South Kensington Museums. It is recognised by the State decentralised into municipalities, in the formation of libraries and art galleries in all our large towns. Now, too, it is recognised in relation to the special type of higher education given in our universities, in the yearly grants by the Treasury to the various universities and university colleges—grants which are added to by the municipalities.

The State, then, already admits a duty to support higher education. But we can only describe it as a reluctant admission. There is no enthusiasm on the part of governments to encourage such education, no determination to secure that it shall be provided, and shall be efficient. What has been given by the Treasury has been given almost grudgingly. The Treasury has held that higher education is chiefly to be supported by benevolent subscribers. If these are not forthcoming, the State has no call to help, no duty lies on it to see that the education shall be efficient, or even that it shall be provided in any form. This lack of enthusiasm is really shared by the general body of the people. Here and there are wealthy men, willing to contribute large sums to our colleges, but the subscribers form a minute proportion of the population. As a nation, we have little interest in the subject. A generation ago we woke up to the necessity for universal elementary education. Now the new education committees are devising machinery for improving secondary schools. But, still there is no change in the provision for higher education. Newspapers of every party express the pious opinion that Sir Norman Lockyer is justified in his advocacy, that we ought to face the situation and spend more money, but there it stops. No member of Parliament advocates the claims of the universities in season or out of season, no commission is appointed to inquire what a proper equipment would be, no Chancellor of the Exchequer dare suggest a fraction of the expenditure urged by the president of the British Association, for the nation is not interested.

Yet some such expenditure is necessary if higher education is to be general and efficient. At the risk of saying what has been said often and better by others, I am going to attempt to point out briefly why it is important that the nation should be interested, and why it should determine to spend enough to make higher education much more general than it is and much more efficient.

In old days, and right down to the last generation, when either literary subjects or science subjects, taught more or less by literary methods, were the chief vehicles for higher education, the expense was not necessarily very great. A teacher, a room, and a few books only, were needed by the pupils. But we have begun to learn that in a very large proportion of young people, and, I believe, in the vast majority, attention is best aroused, interest is best kindled, and ultimately most culture is attained by putting scientific or professional or technical studies in the first place, and giving literary studies the second place. We have begun to learn that not only pure science, but science applied to manufacture and commerce may be studied as a means of culture, not, perhaps, the highest, but certainly the most efficient for many students. I wish we could cease to compare ourselves with Germany and America, cease to argue that we shall be beaten in the commercial race if we do not improve our education, and take instead the far higher ground that the study for a profession or a trade may be an ennobling study, that every reputable profession or trade may be prepared for and lived as if it were a life worth living. That is the true view. When once the nation is inspired by the idea, students will flock to our universities and adequate State support will not be lacking. For most of the students, the universities will be training grounds for the professions enabling them to prepare worthily for their work in life. Quite clearly, then, it is essential for the higher life of the nation, that what is done at the universities should be done thoroughly; and this involves vast expenditure on teachers, on libraries, and on laboratories.

There is another reason why universities should be expensive to maintain. They are, or should be, seats of learning, not only for pupils, but for teachers. Everyone in a university should be a learner. On the side of letters this means, in the first place, libraries; on the side of science, in the first place, laboratories. But, above all, it means more leisure for the teachers. It means more professors, more assistants, so that all their time and energy should not be given, as it now too often is, to teaching. The advantage of the atmosphere of research round a college or a university is not merely in the discoveries made, which may or may not lead to money and comfort, but it is far more in raising the ideal, in directing the attention of the young student to learning, to the investigation of the past, to the patient study of nature, lifting him above the sordid study of examination methods and the craving for letters to stick after his name. I am inclined to believe that the British worship of degree examinations is very largely responsible for the lack of enthusiasm for higher education. I am a teacher of too many years' experience to wish to abolish examinations. I know how important they are to both pupil and teacher in their proper place and on a proper scale. But they may be made much less formal and much more efficient than they are as a rule in this country. Here the examination to be passed at the end of a course is the great consideration all through the course. The one public, all important, final examination is, I am convinced, bad for many men, and thoroughly bad for all women. It concentrates the attention on the wrong issue, leads to an overestimate of the value of a degree, and an underestimate of the culture which the degree should merely attest. This mischievous concentration of attention on examinations and degrees has been forcibly borne in on my mind when I have acted as examiner at the University of London. Year after year I have recognised the same faces at the same examinations; often elderly candidates coming up again and again, each time only to fail. At first sight it looks like a courageous struggle worthily maintained. But look at what it means. Look at the futile waste of the little leisure these men have from their labour as teachers—and they are nearly all teachers—to prepare every year the same set of subjects for examination. Every study has now become merely a "subject," for all the life was sucked out of it in the first year. They waste their time in fruitless efforts to put an examination edge on to their knowledge. They spend themselves on a treadmill when they might be out in the fresh air.

A larger equipment of our universities in staff, in libraries, in laboratories, would make them more efficient as seats of learning or research, and would inevitably reduce their importance as examination machines. The examination would sink into its proper place, and no longer be the wretched ideal it now is.

Universities equipped on any such scale cannot be self-supporting. They would only then be accessible to the wealthy, who, at present, do not show any very keen desire for higher education, at any rate of the scientific kind. But they would benefit the nation as a whole, and the nation should support them. It is too important a matter to be left much longer to the chances of private benevolence. As yet, I do not think we want all that Sir Norman Lockyer asks for. We have not yet attracted the students. There is not yet the demand which may encourage such expenditure. But the nation will yet wake up to the need for higher education for all the professions, not that it may keep abreast in the commercial race, not that it may win back the pearl button trade or the aniline dye manufacture, but that it may live a higher life, a life worthy of a great people.

J. H. POYNTING.

THE Rev. L. E. Tony André, of Florence, the author of the paper on "The Liberal Movement in Italy," contributed to the London meeting of the International Council in 1901, obtained this autumn the degree of Doctor of Theology in the University of Geneva. The thesis which he "brilliantly defended," as a writer in Le Protestant relates, before the Theological Faculty of the University, dealt with the "Apocrypha of the Old Testament," and this work is now published as a substantial volume, of which we hope before long to give a fuller account in these columns. Meanwhile, we congratulate Dr. André upon his book, and the distinction he has achieved.

MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS.

A REPLY.

I ACT upon the permission given me to say the last word in this discussion, though I feel that I have already been allowed a more than liberal share of space and attention.

It may be well, perhaps, to present once more the main points of the original paper:—

(1) A mission should reach those to whom settled churches appeal in vain.

(2) A mission which becomes itself a settled church loses its power of wider and freer appeal.

(3) The primary object of mission work is to awaken, or re-awaken, the thought of God.

(4) Its methods should be distinct from those of ordinary social or philanthropic work, and be independent of them.

(5) It ought not to be connected with charitable relief.

(6) It will find its opportunities in the strengthening of family life rather than in the construction of congregational life.

(7) The missionary should be resident.

I must not repeat the arguments by which these points were supported, but I may, perhaps, be excused if I say that I do not think they have always been fully faced. That they have not, in some instances, even been understood, is perhaps my fault only.

The first two points have not been seriously questioned. In connection with the third, one objector expresses doubt as to the value of "visible" conversion, or "sudden" regeneration. I will remind him that the adjectives are his own, not mine, and address myself to the exceptions taken to the remaining four.

(4) Several disputants ask why mission work proper should be detached from what is commonly called social work: are they not both religious? My plea is the plea of expediency. There is no reason why they should not be combined, except that in the present state of society such combination is unwise. As long as social work in poor neighbourhoods is bound up with denominational interests, and is made to serve them, so long will its usefulness be limited, and its motive be suspected. Nothing, I fear, will now convince the labouring poor that clubs and classes, treats and entertainments, in connection with religious missions, are not so many rival devices for attaching them to the bodies which send them forth. The result must be in many cases a lowered respect for both objects. There is great need of social settlements, in which workers of all denominations may co-operate with greater social effect, and with wider public support; and there is need also of bolder and more direct deliverance of a message which cannot be received at all, if it be not received for its own sake. Have we lost faith in the message, and in men?

(5) All that has been said under the last head applies with even greater force to the connection of mission work with almsgiving. I observe that some of my co-debaters admit the economic argument, and then fall back upon the plea that "occasions will arise," &c., &c. May we not say that the question is again a question of expediency? There are forces which must be insulated, that they may have their due effect. Every official, for the sake of his office—its character and its efficiency—must recognise the bounds of his office, and see also that they are recognised by others, or mischievous confusion will arise. Would it not be better to break the connection between religious effort and charitable relief, if in these days, as many now tell us, it brings discredit on charity and religion alike? What else will root out that lurking suspiciousness which follows the pastor, as it does not follow other professional men?—follows the poorer members of his flock, as it does not follow those who act under other professional direction?—makes the self-respecting and independent stand away, lest suspicion should fall in turn upon themselves? I am only echoing what has been said again and again, not by the enemies, but by the friends, of religious endeavour. The minister's rule must be a fast rule. By occasional exceptions he makes general confidence impossible. To dole out that which is placed in his hands is a fatally easy way out of many difficulties, and it is this taking of the line of least resistance, Mr. Booth contends, which leaves him in the end with only poor women and children to look after. If he would have a robust influence, let him take Prudence as his companion, and allow Charity to have her own separate mission. I have not forgotten the injunctions to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, but neither have I forgotten the pastoral injunction: "Be ye wise as serpents."

(6) As to "provided" places of worship, some correspondents ask whether "endowed" churches are not "provided" churches. My answer is that endowments given by the rich, worshipping with the poor, are one thing, and the provision of mean churches for mean streets by those who have no intention of entering either the street or the church is quite another. Healthy sentiment rebels against this "patronage," as Mr. Drummond courageously calls it. And is not developed worship, with its advanced and difficult demands, something which should be the end rather than the starting-point? Would it not be more "edifying," in the true sense of the word, to begin with simpler forms of association? There is a social scale in rough neighbourhoods which runs down many degrees below the point at which it is assumed that you wear a black coat or a comely bonnet, and can find your place in a hymn-book. Opportunities for public worship everywhere abound, and are little used. The people who most need help are the last to come to be preached to. Let them first be helped to help themselves, and one another, where they live. If separate congregational life be afterwards desired, let it grow out of the spontaneous feeling and voluntary efforts of those who desire it, and have spirit enough to maintain it. It is not a question, let me here say, of "giving up" certain missions, and the agencies which have clustered round them; they might be maintained under another name; the question is, whether a missionary's work is not rather preparatory than administrative work, and this is all that I mean when I say that he should often change his ground.

(7) The almost unanimous feeling in favour of residence, as advisable in itself, is qualified by more than one "but" of practical consideration. Let me say once more that there are practical considerations on the other side. If I were a poor man in a poor house, I am afraid it would make a great difference to me whether my well-meaning visitor, with his kindly interest in my affairs, were a neighbour, or not; and, I must add, some difference in my reception of him.

The contributions of Mr. Harding and Mr. Timmis are interesting in themselves, but they draw the discussion down from the region of abstract debate, and attach it too much to places and names and actual operations, with which we are not immediately concerned.

We have not done much, I fear, towards the solution of the problem, but it is something, perhaps, to have looked a little more closely into its difficulties.

AT ALLAH'S BAR.

WHEN the trumpet wakes the dead—
So Arabia's sage hath said—
And all nations gather'd are Trembling before Allah's bar:
To the children word is sent—
"Come, for ye are innocent:
Come to Paradise your home;
Not for you the sinner's doom."
Then the children hesitate,
Pausing at the Golden Gate;
Saying, "Let our parents through,
Let them share our pleasure too."
But the Angels make reply:
"They have sinned, it cannot be;
They to judgment must be sent,
And perhaps to punishment."
Still the children's cry is heard,
And it smites the ear of God.
"What is it I hear," says He,
"Children crying bitterly?"
Then the Angels will reply:
"O Compassionate! they cry
For their earthly parents dear:
They refuse to enter here
While without their parents stand."
Allah then will give command:
"Children, take them by the hand,
Drag them up, and take them in,
Safe from judgment, saved from sin:
By their little ones restor'd
To the Paradise of God."

LITERATURE.

LIBERAL ORTHODOXY AND MODERN UNITARIANISM.*

ONE of the great needs of our religious communion is more definite doctrine. We have soothed ourselves too long with the platitudinous maxim "Religion not Theology," as if the object of our worship were not eternal truth as well as infinite love. We, who to our critics seem to stand for an austere rationalism, sometimes profess among our own comrades a fellowship of religious sentiment not virile enough to render an intellectual account of itself. Some among us have indeed sought to provide a remedy that is only ten times worse than the disease, namely, a bitter anti-trinitarianism hopelessly out of touch with life. Others, weary of the hallowing discipline of thought, have sunk into mental lethargy. These remain in a fog of half-beliefs, not having energy enough to think themselves through to the other side. Even if we grant that religion is based on feeling, yet "Feeling by itself is blind. Man is made not only to act and to feel, but also to think; and a religion which neglects thought is in a hopelessly decadent condition." In this work of thinking out religious feeling, may it not fairly be said that liberal orthodoxy is rapidly pushing ahead of us, and that we are in danger of becoming mere camp followers on the march of contemporary theology? Liberal orthodoxy has at least firmly grasped the actual situation, and clearly perceived that the difficulties of our time are not those to which we are in the habit of addressing ourselves. The problems that confront us are stubborn problems of thought. The controversies of Scriptural Unitarianism and of old-fashioned orthodoxy already give forth a hollow sound. The few differences that remain between us and our orthodox friends will be practically settled by higher criticism and the science of comparative religion, in probably less than twenty years. In the meantime we are being challenged to a supreme experiment. Modern liberalism suffers from too little and too much thought; too much to become a popular revivalism, too little to conquer the scepticism of our age. It cannot go back. To go forward, it must concentrate on a decisive effort to make prehensible for the Agnostic head but Christian heart, those imperishable realities that are gathered up into such words as God, Christ, Church, inspiration, duty, prayer, immortality. To habituate ourselves to a masterly shirking of this task is not only to weaken our movement but to import into it something akin to unreality. Ignorant orthodoxy and crude secularism are no longer living forces. They may be left to the tender mercies of time. The element we have to reckon with is a polite but unphilosophical agnosticism that seeks wistfully after a satisfying religion and meanwhile plays with one or other of the modern cults or with the neo-pagan side of the High Church movement. Trained intellects that might come to the rescue have too frequently either lacked religious purpose or have disdainfully confined themselves to technical pronouncements delivered to an academic coterie. It is all too rarely that they condescend to come down from the heights to hold human converse with merely "well-read" persons still struggling in the valleys.

Dr. Mellone is one of the notable exceptions. He sees our need and sincerely tries to meet it. Those of us who have wrestled with his volume of "Essays in Philosophical Criticism and Construction" have felt the strength and suppleness of his mind. Since then we have had the pleasure of reading his "Leaders of Religious Thought in the Nineteenth Century," by far the most fascinating biographical presentation of liberal religion that has been given to us. And now he appears in yet simpler form in this slight volume of 179 pages. What the Rev. R. J. Campbell did for liberal orthodoxy in "A Faith for To-day," what Mr. Herbert Rix has lately done for the more religious wing of the ethical movement in "A Dawning Faith," that Dr. Mellone has attempted to do for modern Unitarianism in "Converging Lines of Religious Thought." One of the chief merits of the book is its sympathetic consideration of liberal orthodoxy. The author, who counts it "a privilege to serve the little group of churches known as Unitarian," is steeped in the writings of broad-minded theologians of the right. He realises that the arid "anti" attitude towards the various doctrines which Christendom has hitherto regarded as fundamental will not do. That is only to advance to nothing. The book does full justice to these doctrines, treats them with patience and respect, and re-interprets their essential truths into more consistent and universal forms. Another attractive feature is the moderation and restraint of its method. It never overstates an argument so as to make the reader cry out, "Prove less and I'll admit all." How often have we been given arguments for the "existence of God" which proceed with an irritating dialectical precision and leave us at last, like the verger after the bishop's elaborate "proof," protesting, "He may say what he likes, but I still believe in God, I do!" Dr. Mellone approaches this subject in another way:—

> "Prove the existence of God, if you can." A plausible demand; yet it is a thoroughly unreasonable one. As a matter of fact, no such proof could ever be given; for if anyone sets out to "prove the existence of God" he finds himself—just in proportion to the thoroughness with which he thinks the problem out—thrown back on another question, as to the meaning of the existence which we assert of Man and the World.

From this standpoint he proceeds, taking us on our own ground and moving slowly and persuasively, neither demanding too much nor doubting too little, until we are disposed to belief. The chapter on "Revelation, Inspiration, and Miracle" is a model of affirmative treatment. These are just the truths from which we have washed out nearly all the distinctive colours. Here, however, they are restored to real significance and power:—

> God himself says something to man, that is revelation; God himself does something for man—that is miracle. If, therefore, we simply deny all revelation and all miracle, we are asserting a God who has nothing to do with us, and who might as well not exist so far as we are concerned. . . . Every genuine religious belief involves belief both in revelation and in miracle of some sort.

Of what sort I leave the reader to find out for himself. Again:—

> Even the great thought of God as the Life on which all other lives depend, the Life which is the perfect realisation of all that is best in other lives, may be so understood as to compel the conclusion that the existence of God makes no difference to any particular thing, that we need not take account of him, any more than in our bodily life we take account of the pressure of the atmosphere.

It has been said that to see the ideal anywhere we must see it everywhere. Dr. Mellone seems continually to be emphasising the far more important practical truth that to see the ideal everywhere we must learn to see it somewhere. While "universalising" the great truths of Revelation, Inspiration, Miracle, Authority, &c., he does not empty them of all original content, and so run liberal thought into a blind alley with, as Professor William James puts it, "a God who can raise no particular weight whatever, who can help us with no private burden, and who is on the side of our enemies as much as He is on our own." He sets before us God as One who is not only found but who finds and comes to meet us.

"The Incarnation and the Trinity" are handled in the same constructive temper. A brief but adequate historical sketch precedes an examination of modern Sabellianism and the "social" Trinity of the New Theology. The doctrine of the Incarnation, not as connected with a miraculous birth, but in the now familiar sense of "God in Christ," is convincingly defended; but that God is the personality of Christ is denied, for this fails to give any intelligible account of his human nature. The alternative, either the Trinity or a lonely God, is met thus:—

> Seeing that there is a vital relation and constant communion between God and his rational offspring, he could only be "lonely" if or when this intercourse did not exist. Was there ever a time when the Infinite God was not calling into existence worlds fitted for the development of lives in whom he might, in gradually increasing measure, reveal himself? There is no reason to believe that there ever was such a time.

And in a note it is added:—

> There may be worlds upon worlds of life, unknown to us, and these may have always been.

With the same desire to evoke the soul of truth from partial error, Dr. Mellone discusses orthodox doctrines that deal with the Atonement, Redemption, Jesus of Nazareth, and the Immortal Hope. But enough has been said to indicate the scope and method of a book which breathes throughout a high spirit of Christian discipleship. Its chief defect, in my opinion, is the unsatisfactory brevity of its treatment of evil. This problem is one of the most desperate that a religious teacher has to face. Even in such a short and simple sketch as this we might reasonably have expected to find a chapter instead of a paragraph devoted to the subject. I also think the book is somewhat overweighted with quotations, though these are always well chosen and to the point.

AN AGNOSTIC'S APOLOGY.*

PERHAPS the demand for a second edition of Sir Leslie Stephen's pleasant volume of essays is due rather to their literary charm than to the intrinsic value of their argument. It is always entertaining to follow the thrusts and parries of a skilled fencer (especially if the general air of good-humour on his face gives you confidence that there is a button on his foil), apart from the merits of the dispute in which he is engaged. There is also a quaint humour in the assumption of the rôle of despised and persecuted heretic by our popular K.C.B., crowned, as he is, with literary honours. For we all know in our hearts that in these days the part of cultivated "agnostic" is a much surer pass to the pleasant places of the social and literary worlds than that of one of the "theologians" a little outside the strait paths of the fashionable orthodoxy. It is quite comme il faut to be an agnostic in company with Huxley or Stephen or Arnold, but decidedly outré to be a pronounced Unitarian. To be an unpronounced one is quite another thing.

So that Sir Leslie's account of the social woes accruing from his agnostic idiosyncrasies has not, we confess, kept us awake o' nights. On the contrary, we can read without perturbation his sallies on "the theologians," enjoying them when they are deserved, and laughing at them when they are not—perhaps the more frequent case of the two.

In the first essay, for example, that which gives a title to the book, there is many an argument that is provoking, whether it be of resentment or amusement. What, for instance, could be more eighteenth-century-like in its rigid and narrow logicality than the paragraph (p. 21) beginning: "The free-will hypothesis is the device by which theologians try to relieve God of the responsibility for the sufferings of His children"? The words "hypothesis" and "device" imply that the belief in the freedom of the will is a plan hit off by logical ingenuity, without relation to the facts, for a certain theological purpose. Whereas, Sir Leslie Stephen knows well enough that in the systems of all thinkers of the better sort it is not a "device" at all, but a simple attempt to state the immediate deliverance of consciousness. We do not argue to, but from free-will. "I can" is a primary deposit of self-consciousness, however mysterious, however inexplicable, however difficult to harmonise logically with other facts of the universe. "I think, therefore I am," is not a more fundamental syllogism than "I can, therefore I am"; nor is the one less capable of supporting the superincumbent structure of a complete philosophy than the other. Even if it were true, as alleged, that the "device" makes "the universe a moral chaos," none the less would a faithful reading of consciousness compel every man of us to say "I can." And Sir Leslie Stephen, with every other human being, conducts all life on that "hypothesis."

The same reply is obvious to the statement (p. 28) that "we escape from Pantheism by the illogical device of free-will." Free-will is not a "device" excogitated for the sake of engineering a road of escape from any philosophical bog, but a bottom fact of human experience.

Again (p. 30), the distinguished critic says:—

> The Christian revelation makes statements which, if true, are undoubtedly of the very highest importance. God is angry with man. Unless we believe and repent we shall all be damned. It is impossible, indeed, for its advocates even to say this without instantly contradicting themselves. Their doctrine frightens them. They explain in various ways that a great many people will be saved without believing, and that eternal damnation is not eternal, nor damnation. It is only the vulgar who hold such views, and who, of course, must not be disturbed in them; but they are not for the intelligent.

Now this is certainly racy, but is it not a little cheap? Surely the foremost English literary critic of the day might find men worthier of his steel than the men whom this will hit. We can all be smart at the expense of persons not worth noticing, though perhaps not so cleverly smart as Sir Leslie; and we shall have the laugh with us, which is pleasant. But our essayist, of course, knows quite well that "the Christian revelation" does not make these statements. He knows, too, that educated and accredited theologians make neither the assertions nor the reservations which he sets down to them. Or, if he persists in ranking the men who do thus assert and shuffle as educated and accredited theologians, he knows that in hacking them to pieces, exhilarating work though it be, he is making no real contribution to the controversy between theology and agnosticism.

But Sir Leslie Stephen winds up with further expatiation on the horrible treatment which he suffers for his agnostic opinions:—

> When one of us ventures to declare that we don't know the map of the universe as well as the map of our infinitesimal parish, he is hooted, reviled, and perhaps told that he will be damned to all eternity for his faithlessness. (P. 40.)

However, Sir Leslie will be magnanimous, and meekly declares:—

> Whilst you trumpet forth officially your contempt for our scepticism, we will at least try to believe that you are imposed upon by your own bluster. (P. 41.)

This is indeed turning the other cheek to the smiter. We close the essay with a silent tribute to the essayist. Sir Leslie gives as good as he gets, but he will do so no more. That is good news; but we confess to some inquisitiveness as to the when and the where of the "hooting" of this poor, unprotected K.C.B., and the official trumpeting forth of the official trumpeter's contempt. THE HEART OF A HERETIC.*

THIS is a supremely interesting book, which quite fulfils the claim of its subtitle, and really is "A Human Document on the Search for Spiritual Truth." The writer is evidently a man of considerable culture, as his range of quotation shows. Sometimes his work is overloaded with the thoughts of others, when the reader is anxious to enjoy his own. It is dedicated to truth-seekers, not "to those who are comfortably tucked up in one or other of the various forms of Christian faith, which are familiar amongst us." The book is not, after all, an exposition of a very terrible heresy. Its author's first object is to reach spiritual truth. He has evidently been more deeply influenced by the teaching of St. John than by the narratives of the Synoptic writers. But that fact only gives a higher and a deeper value to his thoughts. He is said to be a man of affairs; he is undoubtedly a man of keen observation and considerable humour in expressing the results of his observation. He claims to be an optimist; but his optimism does not prevent him from criticising with considerable sharpness the failure of men in general to realise the spiritual meaning of their Christian profession, and the importance of Christ to any sound religious progress. He has evidently suffered much from sickness of some kind, which has had an abiding effect on his style and his thoughts.

His book is divided into three sections: The first is touchingly entitled "From the Schoolroom," and implies that he has taken his physical weakness as God's method of schooling him for his life in the world: His abhorrence for creed early shows itself, and he seldom loses an opportunity of pointing out the little help which creed affords to holy living. The second section bears the name of "A Holiday Task." He would seem to have been sent to Egypt for his health, and the influence of the wide desert has done much to give its tone to this portion of his work. There he had opportunity to measure his own thoughts, the keynote to which is well struck in the following passage:—

> You shall know Love as the fulfilling of the law. Not the Christ of the Jews, nor the Christ of the ecclesiastics, nor the Christ of a particular and partial conception of the Atonement, but the Christ who is the First-born, first among the potential equals—equals in kind, though not in degree—differing from us as the Perfect from the imperfect, as that which is from that which shall be, Christ the revealer of the potential divinity of man, Christ the revealer of At-One-ment, the point of contact between God and man, the Christ who announced to us our right to be sons of God. Christ the Word made Flesh, now made Spirit in the hearts of men. This is the Christ of God.

Few will deny that the foregoing words are strong writing, or that they have a most important bearing upon the thought of the Christian world. Throughout the chapters dealing with the author's "Holiday Task," in different words and illustrated by a too abundant wealth of quotation, these thoughts recur again and again. The misfortune of most theological speaking or writing is this, that it emanates either from professed theologians, or from the ministry. It is not easy to get at the real thought of the laity upon the deep things of life. Here we have much thought pungently expressed, and the result of hard thinking, which can hardly fail to stimulate thought in ourselves.

In illustrating his deep sense of the need of greater spirituality, the author often presses home his point by an apt comparison of the state of things as it is, with the state of things as it might be. On one occasion he exclaims with too much truth, "Who that knows some of the conditions of life still obtaining in rural England, the overbearing, narrow-minded attitude of some of the country clergy, but regards the spirit they exhibit, and rightly regards it, with a feeling amounting to loathing? But even though we be not of them, shall the picture blind us to the self-sacrificing lives of many of their brethren in orders in the large cities and the slums, giving their lives to helping the living and soothing the hours of the dying poor?" Herein our author does but justice to the town clergy and to some of the country clergy. He is sick of the narrowness of a section of the latter, and sighs for a spiritual teaching which they cannot give. We should do well to take care that we ourselves do not offend in this way. Of many a Free Churchman it may truly be said, Mutato nomine de te fabula narratur. Once again he puts in a powerful plea for the wise use of the Bible, making no fetish of it but feeling its inspiration where the inspiration is manifest. He says, "If only we could rid ourselves of the artificial difficulties which result from its artificial treatment, and as men and women—"men in a world of men"—pick it up from a railway bookstall, or alight on a chance copy in a camel-track of the desert, as a book that was absolutely new to us, then, if ever questioned as to whether we believed it to be inspired, should we not answer with the friend I have already quoted, I don't believe it, I feel it?"

Perhaps enough has been said to attract the attention of readers to a book, which is a real human document. All will not agree with the third section, in which the author is "in the schoolroom again," and treats of "The Cross and the Cosmos" and "Egypt in England." By the last subtitle possibly is meant the living influence which the recollection of the sublimity of the desert and the thoughts which it inspired, exercised over him in the invalid room. The book is a human document, we repeat, quivering with emotion and thrilling with an intense desire to help wandering truth-seekers. The author finds his link between God and man in the Christ, who taught us to be "one with the Father," and who has left us a living example of that final consummation of Christianity. The stern condemnation of modern unreality and self-seeking, of loud professions and poor practice, the repeated plea to seek the Father as Jesus did, the noble insistence on the value of a spiritual life, the wide culture employed to illustrate these varied thoughts, and the forceful if somewhat disjointed style, appeal to such readers as are capable of serious reading and as really care to know what has helped another truthseeker to find his way through the gloom of sickness to the Father of all.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

1 CORINTHIANS XIII.

II.

I HOPE you will all learn this chapter by heart, children, if you have not done so already. It will be a possession to you all your lives.

In the third verse, Paul continues, "And if I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and if I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profiteth me nothing."

He tells them of the love that must run through and colour all we do, to make our deeds worth anything. If a person gives his goods to the poor he should give some of himself too. There was a rich man who was very much pressed by a benevolent man to give him some money to help some poor people in a time of need. The rich man refused, but after a time he said, very unwillingly, "Oh, well, I'll give you five pounds; I don't suppose I shall miss it." The other said to him, "Thank you, sir; I only wish you would give me something that you would miss." You know how delightful it is to receive a present from someone who gives it with love and willingness, especially if you know that he has gladly taken trouble about it for you, and been determined to give the best he could. Gifts that are only made because we think we ought to give are very different from those that spring from a free and loving heart.

I read a story once, which I have not been able to find again, about a little boy who asked his mother what a martyr was. She answered that the martyrs were people who, out of love, gave up what they most cared for—their own lives, their friends and homes—for the sake of others and the truth; and when she told him more about them, the little boy thought it very grand, and wished to be like the martyrs. A little friend came to play with him, and he thought he would give him some of his very nicest toys; so he arranged his cupboard, so that all the things would look nice and be handy to get out. But there was one thing that he loved above all the others, a little accordion, for playing music. When he came to that, and felt that he loved it best, he sat on the floor with it in his hands, thinking. Would the martyrs have given up that? He couldn't do it. He thrust it to the very back of the shelf, and hoped Tom would not see it. When Tom came, Freddy showed him the cupboard, and told him he might choose something out of it; Tom was overjoyed, and took the things out, while Freddy stood by; but when the accordion was found, and the child liked it best, Freddy burst into such a passion of crying that his mother came to see what was the matter. He hid his face in her dress; and when he could speak he said, "I wanted to be like the martyrs; but I can't give him my accordion!" But Tom still liked it the best, and Freddy's mother told him that the martyrs gave with a willing heart; and Freddy said that perhaps they did not care quite as much as he did for his accordion. But yes, his mother thought they did, quite as much. And then she told him that Tom had hardly any toys, whilst he had a cupboard full; and Freddy said Tom might have any of the other things. So his mother put all the toys back in the cupboard, and sent the boys out to play in the garden. They were very happy, and did not think much more about it; but when Tom was going home, Freddy came rushing out of the nursery, and thrust the accordion into Tom's hand, with a very red face; and when he was gone he hid his face for a minute in his mother's dress, and then looked up brightly and said, "Now am I like the martyrs, mother? and will God be angry with me because I can't help being sorry."

When King David wanted to make a sacrifice to the Lord which he thought would stop a pestilence which was raging, he asked a man named Araunah to sell him a "threshing floor," where corn was threshed that he might make an altar there; and Araunah wanted to give it to him, and the animals for the sacrifice also. But David refused to accept it, and said, "Nay, but I will surely buy it of thee; neither will I offer burnt offerings unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing."

"If I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profiteth me nothing." You have heard of the martyrs who were taken to the stake and burned for their faith, or persecuted in other ways. If it were possible for them to "give their bodies to be burned" without love, it would indeed be a useless thing; but some very strong love must have held them up and given them courage to face so terrible a death. Their great faithfulness and love of truth made their sacrifice a grand inspiration to those who beheld it or heard of it, and realised what they had done and borne. It gave men a sort of holy vision of what faithfulness and truth must be. They learnt that no outward suffering, however fearful, can ever touch or come near the real faith that a man holds and loves and sees to be true. The fire may burn the body that God gave him, but has no means by which it can reach his soul, any more than it can touch God himself.

There is an old story in the Bible in which Balaam the Prophet was called by Balak the King of Moab to curse the Israelites whom Moses had brought into his country, and Balaam believed that God had forbidden him to do so; so he says, "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God." I cannot—that is fine; it is what the martyrs felt. With God's help they could bear anything, but they could not yield.

And even to Jesus it was hard to "give his body" to be killed; life is dear to every human being; and in reading the story of the end of his life we see that he was "sorrowful even unto death" with the shadow of what was coming; and he prayed that the "cup might pass" from him which it seemed so bitter to drink; but when he learned that it "could not pass from him except he drank it," he freely gave himself to be done with according to God's will.

But what impressed men most was not the terrible death of the martyrs, but the spirit that submitted to it rather than be false; the love so strong that death could not touch or come near it. They gave their bodies to be burned because they had love; love strong enough to conquer death.

THE MINISTRY OF LAY PREACHERS.

THE need of a larger body of lay preachers adequately to maintain the ministry of our churches, where financial resources are not over-abundant and there is yet an abiding call to service, was indicated in our leading article last week, referring to the valuable paper by the Rev. Charles Peach, published at the same time, on "City Churches and the Theory of Independency." It was pointed out that both in city churches, so largely deserted by their old congregations for the suburbs, and in small country places, where the support of resident families of wealth was no longer forthcoming, it was increasingly difficult, and in many cases impossible, for an independent ministry to be maintained, in the sense of each church having a settled minister to itself; and yet the duty was clear, to find some method by which those churches could be maintained as centres of religious life and beneficent activity, for the sake of the people still looking to them or within reach of the ministry they might offer. And the proposal was to group two or more of such churches under the superintendence of one minister, with lay help at his disposal, to provide for regular religious services in each place, and to sustain the various activities centred in the churches.

It should be part of the accepted responsibility of each District Association to organise such a body of lay preachers, with the hearty co-operation of the ministers of the district and the fullest sympathy of the churches, to encourage and promote their training, to recognise the honourable office they fulfil, and to find the best means of directing their activities.

We are accustomed to speak of lay preachers, and yet it is not the preaching that is the chief thing. What we really want is ministers, both men and women, of a truly religious spirit, with devout simplicity and earnestness, to conduct the religious services of the churches. If there is in our community any prejudice against lay preachers, it will be found, we believe, not among ministers but in congregations, and the chief reason, if we mistake not, might be traced to certain unfortunate experiences, where men of self-confidence and too-ready speech have pressed themselves forward, without realising in the least the essential qualification for a devout ministry. If our work is to prosper, it must be understood in our churches by preachers and hearers alike, with a new clearness and earnestness of purpose, that it is not the preaching that is the chief thing, but the maintenance of genuine religious service, both in the worship of the church and in its work.

For this the primary duty rests with the people themselves, with every little gathering of worshippers, which is at the same time a brotherhood, pledged, in however humble a way, to helpful service in the world. For the work, whether in school or in week-night activities, the people on the spot must be chiefly responsible, with the encouragement and guidance, in such cases as we have imagined, of small congregations grouped together, of the superintendent minister; and for the worship, no less, they must realise their own responsibility, and be determined even if no ministerial help is to be had, that they will yet come together, and the voice of prayer and aspiration shall not be silent in their midst. If they are but a handful of humble folk, there will yet surely be one among them who could read a chapter and a hymn or two, and they could look one another in the face, and confess that they still believed in God and His truth, and meant to help one another in brotherly sympathy to be true to Him. Even if none had courage to pray aloud with his brethren, they could at least all say the Lord's Prayer together.

But for the most part, and more surely in the future under the wise plan now suggested, they would have the help in their religious service, either of minister or lay preacher. Still the chief responsibility for the hour of worship would rest with them, but undoubtedly it is a great encouragement and help when the worship is led by a gifted man or woman, with powers of utterance, fully realising the essential demands of a united religious service.

And here there is a great opening for the sincere devotion of lay preachers, and the churches must do their part to call out the gifts of their members and encourage their development and use by heartfelt sympathy. Let it be clearly understood that the first requirement is simplicity and singleness of purpose and a truly reverent spirit, and that what is needed is a man or woman to lead in worship. And for the preaching a beginning may well be made by the reading of some of those sermons, of which there is a good supply, suitable for any service of devotion. To give a specific instance, we will name the little volume of the late Charles Perry's sermons, "Spiritual Perspective," or Brooke Herford's "Courage and Cheer," or his later volume, or some of Robert Collyer's well-known sermons. These are always good to read and good to hear, and take to heart; and if more of our young men of intelligence, nurtured in the traditions and the spirit of our churches, would exercise themselves in the preaching of such sermons, and in all simplicity in the conduct of religious services, it would be a great gain to our common life. If afterwards they were led to the speaking of their own word, so much the better, but let it be understood that this is not essential to a truly helpful ministry in the churches.

As to prayer in the church, where no liturgy is used, there is also sufficient literature for the help of those who desire it, though perhaps more might be provided to meet this specific need. But let any lay preacher anxious to enter on the work, yet fearing to trust himself in public prayer, turn to Dr. Sadler's "Prayers for Christian Worship," the prayers of Theodore Parker and George Dawson, or Robert Crompton Jones's "Book of Prayer," and he will find what he can readily adapt to his own use.

Such work as that for which we plead, to sustain a helpful ministry, will involve much sacrifice on the part of men and women engaged in other regular work throughout the week. This our well-tried lay preachers, who already do so much for the churches, know full well. But they also know what joy there is in the service, to what deepening of personal religion and of strong human sympathies it leads. The more fully this opportunity is realised, and the work adequately organised, the more, we are assured, will the spirit of worship and of brotherhood in our churches grow; out of the sacrifice will come fulness of life.

IMPERIAL EXPANSION.

THERE is no matter, surely, upon which religious-minded men living at the heart of this vast Empire of ours should keep a more jealous eye than the methods by which that Empire is from time to time enlarged and consolidated at the expense of the uncivilised tribesmen around our borders. Following hard upon the heels of the account of the proposed punitive expedition into Thibet, upon which we commented last week, comes an account from the same news agency of a completed expedition of a similar character into the Aden hinterland.

It appears that some tribesmen of the Dumbari country had been shooting Government camels, and looting Government mails. Accordingly, an armed force was despatched to "destroy the chief village of the tribe as a reprisal." This force, which was stubbornly resisted, "proceeded to blow up the houses of the village with gun-cotton, the more inaccessible houses being simply shelled till they collapsed. The crops were then destroyed by the men with their bayonets and swords," after which the force retired to its base. "The time of the expedition was well chosen, the crops on which the tribesmen [with their women and children] depend for their food being fully grown, but not yet cut." It is added that "there was a fierce fire" while the corn-cutting and house-shelling proceeded; "the enemy evidently not having expected such a reprisal." Perhaps they had chanced to hear that England was a signatory of the Hague and other Conventions which forbid a civilised Power to destroy the property of non-combatants without compensation, or to deprive women and children of food and shelter.

This is work, perpetrated in our name, upon which assuredly the Churches should have something to say. Something may yet be done to save the innocent victims of this particular raid from starvation and death. The worst of the mischief in Thibet, too, may still be prevented. No official light has been shed, up to the time of writing, upon the true origin and aim of the proposed further expedition towards the Thibetan capital. Ministerial papers seem quite content with the explanation given by the news agency quoted last week—that a mission set out to discuss trade matters and the alleged non-observance of commercial treaties by Thibet; that the Thibetan authorities, taking exception to its escort of three hundred Sikhs and a maxim gun, refused to treat till the mission had retired into Indian territory; and that rumours have come from Lhassa that an attempt is to be made to eject the invaders by force.

We pointed out last week the absurdity of seeking to justify an armed expedition into a foreign country on the ground of opposition offered to a previous armed expedition carried out in time of peace. But apart altogether from this, the mere announcement that Thibet has given cause of offence which can only be wiped out by war, with its inevitable corollary of annexation, read in the light of the repeatedly expressed views of the "forward" party in India, is sufficient to arouse the suspicion that a quarrel has arisen because a quarrel was desired. If Thibet does not want to trade with us, it is difficult to see what right we have to make her, and it would be interesting to know to what extent she was a free agent in the negotiation of the commercial treaties she is alleged to have broken. At a time when our statesmen at home are representing foreign imports as an evil to be fought by all legitimate means, we are surely hardly in a position to enforce more enlightened views of the question upon the monk rulers of Lhassa by means of bayonets and maxim guns.

But it is pleaded by the apologists of the expedition that it is necessary to counteract the growing influence of Russia in this buffer territory, and even that if India is to be safe Thibet must be in British hands. If that is the real reason for the expedition it seems a little unworthy to put forward all this talk of breaches of commercial treaties and to attempt to put the responsibility for hostilities on Thibet. If we must be filibusterers in the interests of India, let us be frank filibusterers and not hypocritical ones. It has repeatedly been shown, however, that our best line of defence against Russian aggression is the very line which now separates us from Thibet in the north-east and from Afghanistan in the north-west. By subduing the tribes beyond this line and making military roads through their mountain fastnesses we are making easier and not more difficult the task of the Russian invader. It has never yet been shown that Russia has the least intention or desire to conquer India, but popular credulity has been played upon, and the bogie of a Russian invasion has been used to justify extensions of territory desired on their own account, and impossible of defence merely on the ground on which it is pretended they are required.

War is intrinsically an abominable thing, and a war of conquest is the most abominable kind of war. But it must always be borne in mind that, in the quarters where these campaigns of annexation, great and small, are planned and pushed forward, that is not the light in which it is regarded. When we are at war it is necessary to consult the soldier as to the strategy to be adopted to secure success. But we must not surrender to the soldier the right to determine when or whether war is necessary or desirable, or what our treatment shall be of the non-combatant population of the country we invade. To attack Thibet after deliberately picking a quarrel—still more to attempt to conquer Thibet—would be not only foolish and dangerous, but wrong—as wrong as to deprive a whole countryside of all food and shelter for the supposed wrongdoing of a section of its population. And it is because we know that this kind of method of extending our empire is wrong that we seek to hoodwink ourselves and each other—we cannot hoodwink our opponents or our neighbours—with cant about broken treaties, scientific frontiers, and Imperial missions.

DR. G. DAWES HICKS, late minister of Unity Church, Islington, was appointed by the Senate of the University of London, at their meeting on November 18, a member of the Theological Board of Studies.

THE MYSTERY OF GOD.

SIR,—When people talk about their "experience of God," they usually mean the enjoyment of an emotion which may be anything, from the whisper of an angel to an æsthetic thrill.

I was talking about the supposed difficulty of belief in the spirit-people, and I said it was as easy to believe in them as in the Spirit-God; and easier, for we have experience of a person who is somewhere; but no experience of a person who is everywhere. That transcends not only experience but imagination. So God is to me a great inference, inevitable, irresistible, overpowering; and I am more certain of His existence than of my own, because I am only one of the small throbs of the Universal Life.

As for taking away the ground of all personal religion, my own opinion is that it is the excessive humanising of God which does that. I have no more to say.

BAYLISS v. COLERIDGE.

SIR,—Your note on the result of this libel action hardly does justice to Mr. Coleridge; it also passes over the good that may result to the anti-vivisection cause, by having the practices that go on under the ægis of the present Acts brought before the public gaze.

So far as the action itself is concerned, the question was simply whether Dr. Bayliss, who had a limited licence, only entitling him to vivisect animals under anæsthetics, had notwithstanding operated upon a dog not under such protection. The charge against Dr. Bayliss was in effect one of torture, and was especially serious for him, holding as he did a limited licence only. Many persons, though they may realise that the verdict of the jury on the issue presented to them was justified, cannot by any means feel certain that the truth was entirely on the side of Dr. Bayliss, or think £2,000, the damages awarded, otherwise than very excessive.

During the trial, however, other points came out, which it behoves all who are interested in humanity to carefully note.

First, the provision of the Acts that the animal operated upon should at the conclusion of the experiment be destroyed at once, is treated by a distinguished professor very much as a dead letter. The plaintiff admitted that the dog operated upon in this case had been operated upon more than once before, and had lived under the results of one of such operations for several weeks prior to the final operation. What was the excuse given? Only that another dog had been spared!

Secondly, the Acts provide that no vivisection shall take place for demonstration unless it is absolutely necessary for the instruction of students. It appears from what transpired at the trial that the professors of London University College construe the Act to mean that whenever, in the judgment of the professor, instruction can be better given by having recourse to the bodies of living animals, he is at liberty to use vivisection for purposes of demonstration. In the course of lectures referred to at the trial, illustrations by way of vivisection were arranged at more than half the lectures.

These serious disclosures are due to Mr. Stephen Coleridge, and those who sympathise with him should feel it a privilege to help in the fund that will assuredly be raised to save him pecuniary loss, and give him renewed courage to continue the crusade on behalf of humanity to which he is devoting his life. RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

SIR,—Nothing but good can come of the series of dispassionate and careful articles which you are devoting to the education controversy, whatever your final conclusions may be. And those of us who support the policy of "only secular instruction during school hours" cannot but be grateful to you for recognising that we do not put this forward as an ideal, but only as a practical solution for the present, which will give time for the ideal to ripen in men's minds. As you rightly say, "secular" education is not an attractive phrase. All men who care for religion must, one would think, have strong sympathies with Churchmen and Dissenters of all kinds who insist that religion ought to play a great part in the training of the young. If therefore some of us find ourselves (in the strange world of politics) thrown together with the professed antagonists of religion, it is through no hasty and blatant opposition to traditional pieties. We believe that the proposed policy is a necessary step to the ideal.

What is the ideal? It is religious education. If Mr. Carpenter will excuse me for bringing in his name, I should like to say that a hint which he threw out in conversation many years ago, seems to me to touch the highest truth on the matter. He said that the ideal for elementary religious education should be precisely the same as that pursued in Manchester College, the ideal of unfettered teaching of the deepest convictions (whatever these might be) of the teachers' minds. All religious men are agreed that religious teaching can only come from religious convictions. And the ideal is not so Utopian as it seems. Given a set of average teachers who have, by the nature of the situation, only a limited time for religious instruction, and who know that for the good of the school they must work together, we may be sure that common sense would prevent a Catholic teacher insisting on dogmas one day which would be effaced by an Agnostic another day. Within each school, left to itself, a modus vivendi would soon be arrived at. This I believe to be the wisest ideal. It does not lose itself in the quagmires of the liberal doctrine of "each religion paying for its own instruction." It recognises the solidarity of a social system of education. It is (1) Unitarian, and (2) Socialistic.

But for the present the obstacle to be removed is the feud between Church and Dissent. This will not be accomplished by a temporary victory of one of the two parties to a quarrel of three hundred years duration. The "secular" plan aims at getting rid of this misery by permitting denominational instruction out of school hours. And we believe that when it has once been made clear to both parties that the State will not tolerate nonsense, there may be at last a chance for the more excellent way.

MILTON'S LONDON.

IN his address at the autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, Dr. Blake Odgers referred to Milton's noble description of London in his "Areopagitica." For those of our readers who cannot easily turn to the book itself we will quote the passage here. The "Areopagitica," it will be remembered, was an appeal to Parliament, in 1644, "For the Liberty of unlicenced Printing." Milton believed in the people of England, he believed in liberty, and he believed in the power of truth. "Give me," he said "the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties." (We quote from the Clarendon Press Edition.) "Though all the windes of doctrin were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licencing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the wors in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing."

This is the passage with the description of London:—

"Now once again by all concurrence of signs and by the generall instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly expresse their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in his Church, ev'n to the reforming of Reformation it self. What does he then but reveal Himself to his servants, and as his manner is, first to his English-men; I say as his manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of his counsels and are unworthy?

"Behold now this vast City: a City of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompast and surrounded with his protection; the shop of warre hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguer'd Truth, then there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present as with their homage and their fealty the approaching Reformation, others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a Nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soile but wise and faithfull labourers, to make a knowing people, a Nation of Prophets, of Sages, and of Worthies? We reck'n more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already. Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism, we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirr'd up in this City. What some lament of, we rather should rejoyce at, should rather praise this pious forwardnes among men, to reassume the ill deputed care of their Religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to joyn and unite in one generall and brotherly search after Truth, could we but forgoe this Prelaticall tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men."

LONDON EDUCATION.

ON Monday evening a brilliant and informing address on London education was given at the Friends' Meeting House, Bishopsgate-street Without, by Mr. Sidney Webb, L.C.C., being the fourth of a series of lectures on the Problem of Poverty. Mr. Webb said he knew of no cure for that problem, but he felt that much might be done to create a socal condition in which the problem could not exist. Towards this end education must play a great part. Many at least of the two millions of the poor of London were ignorant and lacking in persistence, in regularity, and in "gumption." They belonged to the incapable class; and, to a large extent, they were incapable because they had never received any real education. This, he said, was one of the grounds of his own optimism, when he faced the present situation. The main causes of poverty were manifestly preventible causes, and if that were so, there was every reason for hope. Social and individual disease was not only unnecessary, but something akin to a disgrace, and even to a crime, because it was, on the whole, preventible.

Proceeding, Mr. Webb turned to the actual problem of education in London at the present day. In spite of the many faults and shortcomings of the Acts of 1902–3, he regarded them as the first attempt to give systematic education to London. At last the education of society as a whole is recognised as a public function. Hitherto national education had hardly existed; it was broken up into innumerable fragments; these were now being co-ordinated, and the gaps in our system had at last become evident. The reforms now needed in London were, the lecturer considered—

(1) The "tightening up" of the children's attendance; the 15 per cent of absentees including perhaps 60,000 systematic "irregulars."

(2) The equalising of education in all public elementary schools. Some 200,000 children were compelled by law to attend schools of a most inferior character (principally voluntary schools); these must be levelled up to the best Board School level.

(3) The teaching staff must be improved.

The lecturer laid stress on the fact that the creation of non-sectarian training colleges by local authorities is authorised under the new Act; but dwelt on the narrowing influence of the whole college or seminary system with its segregation of teachers, and the broadening effect of university training.

Speaking of the secondary education of London, Mr. Webb noted that, although chaotic, it showed the largest and most varied array of schools of any city of the world. There were ninety public secondary schools of every kind, with some 25,000 scholars. Besides these, we had the evening schools at 400 centres under the School Board, and in forty large institutions under the Technical Education Committee. But only one-quarter of the children are even on the rolls of these evening schools. He urged that we should look to a time when some evening attendance would be compulsory. Referring to the University of London, he pointed out that no distinction was now made between evening and day students, the privileges of the University being equally open to all, at their own doors, in their own hours, at their own price.

Replying to questions, Mr. Webb suggested that valuable work might be done by individuals.

(1) By studying and thoroughly understanding the powers and scope given under the Act, and explaining these to others.

(2) By filling the very useful position of School managers.

(3) By inviting teachers into their homes and assisting them to a wider social life and horizon.

He approved the reasonable teaching of temperance as a part of physiology and sociology, and said that although he recognised the grave difficulties of religious teaching, his own experience of foreign systems had not encouraged him in any love for purely secular education.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

AUTUMN MEETING.

THE autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, November 18, and was well attended, the formal meeting being preceded by the usual pleasant social hour, at which the company was received by the president, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and Mrs. Odgers. The chair was taken at eight o'clock, and the meeting opened with the singing of Samuel Longfellow's hymn, "One holy Church of God appears."

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, said that the value of that society was that it endeavoured to unite the Unitarians of all parts of London to help in the common work. London he regarded as the finest city in the world, and it was strange to him that those who lived in London were not more proud of their citizenship. If they were to picture an ideal city, it would be one with a noble history, with ancient buildings which spoke to them of the past, a city where men of all nations came, bringing what they had of ancient learning and original thought to the common store, a city of broad streets, with pure water and wholesome dwellings for the people. In that last respect London was infinitely better than it was when he first came to live there, about the year 1865, but a great deal had yet to be done before it would be the ideal city in the matter of the housing of the poor. Turning to another aspect of city life, he recalled Milton's noble picture of London in his "Areopagitica," when Charles had been driven out, and there were as many men keenly at work searching out the truth as there were anvils ringing with the making of armour for the war. Milton pleaded that there must be no restriction in the publishing of truth, and in that matter London stood foremost among cities. But were they doing all that they ought to do, in publishing the truth? Were they doing all they could to dispel error, and to present the truth to those who were alienated from all religion, who yet might welcome their message? What ministers and laity could do in London to spread God's holy truth, was the question they were to consider that night.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, the district missionary minister, gave an address on "The False Sectarianism and the True." To the former he alluded only so far as to point out that it was found where one sect sought to dominate all the rest. True sectarianism was essential to the best work of the world, which had to be done by men in different camps. Jesus indeed broke down the sectarianism of his people, with its sharp racial distinction, and showed how sonship to God was open to all without distinction of race; yet the idea quickly reasserted itself, for man needed a sect to belong to, to call out his best work. All the greatest men were great sectarians. Such were Gladstone and Mazzini, and Martineau. Saint Paul went to the root of the matter in his parable of the body and its members. There must be the different members, but the one spirit in all, or there would be no body. So a tree was made up of innumerable small cells, devoted to different uses, but a common life in all, and thus all were part of the one tree. When they saw all the different sects, the first instinct was to ask why all were not as they themselves? But to understand the matter aright they must look not at the differences but at the unity which existed. It was to be found in that "still more excellent way" of which Paul wrote in 1 Cor. xiii. The love, which was greatest of all, was the very core of the great Church of Christ. When he was a child he used to think that every good man was a kind of Unitarian in disguise; but the more they mingled with good men the more they found it was not so, that other creeds had profound meaning for other men, and different creeds were necessary to one another as the different members of the body. Just as the two eyes looking upon an object give the true impression of its solidity, so the different points of view of a spiritual Quaker, for instance, and a Unitarian made things stand out with a solid reality for them. The great spiritual truths of life were greater, he often thought, than any one man could grasp, but men from different sides looked upon the central truth, and each sect had its own contribution to make. What was demanded was not an easy tolerance; they must believe in the reality of their vision, though it was only partial, and try to get to the very centre of truth, to represent it clearly to their own minds and make it clear to others. Their task was to declare the highest truth, in which love was supreme. Thousands, even millions, he was convinced, belonged to their sect, and ought to be brought in. Only so could they fulfil their great function in the world. To that end he appealed earnestly for support of their Society in its most vital work.

Miss HELEN BROOKE HERFORD spoke of "What Women may do for their Churches." Ministers' wives, she said, were already doing the work of a good many other people, but it was the work of the laywomen of which she had to speak—what they can do in organised bodies and as individuals. Some women's ideas in organising began and ended with sewing-meetings. The sewing-meeting was not to be disparaged. She had known little churches in the West kept together by that very thing, when they had no minister. The women got together for the sewing, and cooked the supper, which the men came and ate, and so they maintained their union, until they were able to have a minister again. But women might do more than that. She instanced the Women's Union, which they had organised at Rosslyn Hill. Before that, the work was not done by the women, it was left undone by the men. What they could do in that connection was, for one thing, to see that the chapel was kept clean. The vigilant eye of the housekeeper was wanted, to attend to all small details for the comfort of minister and people. They could also see that the chapel yards were kept in seemly order, and they might have the care of the communion plate. They should also undertake arrangements for hospitality when supplies came to preach, and should look after the waifs and strays who came up to town and were alone in lodgings. Then as to women's individual work, the training of young Unitarians was, to a great extent, in their hands; it depended largely on the mothers of that generation whether there would be any Unitarians in the coming generation. Mothers could guide the reading of their children. They were often enthusiastic church workers themselves, they should know how to awaken the same enthusiasm in the young people. They should see to the instruction of their children not in doctrine alone, but in the history and principles of their churches. Let them understand what their forefathers had endured, and why it was that their old chapels were sometimes hidden away in back streets, that they might feel how honourable the tradition was and its claim upon their loyalty. Her father's "Story of Religion in England," though it did not tell much about Unitarians, would help them to realise what their past had been. A little persecution might be good for the young people even now; it might put new life into their loyalty.

Dr. C. HERBERT SMITH then spoke on "What Laymen may do for their Churches." There was, he said, great necessity for Unitarians to rouse themselves, and he appealed to the older men not to put on the drag when eager new comers and younger men were pressing forward. They had suffered much in the past, and lost many members, through lack of cordiality in welcoming strangers. He gave his own early experience, when he came to London as a perfect stranger, and for years in the church he attended no one held out a friendly hand to him. It rested with the laymen to increase the sociability of their churches; it was simply the lack of good organisation that strangers who came in were left to feel strange and drift away again. He was tired of hearing reports of how Unitarianism was declining. Even if it was true, let them not talk so much about it, but find out the cause and remedy the evils. Those who had funds to give and were extremely generous to other public institutions, might remember that there were denominational institutions also needing liberal support. Fathers and mothers should remember that if the young people fell away, the responsibility rested with them. In their hands was the training of the young; they ought to instil the right enthusiasm in their children and insure their loyalty. How many of the fathers, for instance, took THE INQUIRER? Yet that would keep them in touch with the work of the churches, and they might enlist the sympathy of their young people. Much more could be done to strengthen their common life by the interchange of visits among the churches. That, no doubt, meant a strain on busy men, but the very object of good organisation was to relieve that strain. To the young men he said, "Join the Laymen's Club"; and they would have to make haste, for there were already 86 members and 100 was the limit. It added zest to the work to feel that they were banded together for a united advance. He appealed to them to have faith in the work. If anyone said the figures were against them, they had excellent authority for saying the figures were only useful for illustration; it was a principle for which they were contending. Great changes were taking place in the religious world, which was rapidly dividing into two main camps. On the one side was the party of retrogression, on the other that of progress. The Roman Catholic Church was gaining recruits from those who were tired of the efforts of freedom and wanted rest; but the forces of progress were growing still stronger, and the scientific spirit was bound to prevail at last. Unitarianism, he believed, so far from being a spent force, was just beginning to do its part in that great fight, and its creed would be found more and more to satisfy thinking people. Whether in the future it would be called Unitarian or not, did not matter. The future was theirs, and they must not be content to dwell on the glories of the past, but believe they were nothing to the glories the future had in store for them.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU proposed a vote of thanks to the speakers, and as a veteran in the work, who had always believed that the young men must be allowed to go forward, expressed his sympathy with what Dr. Smith had said. The motion was seconded by the Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, who received a cordial welcome as a new comer to the district. The motion having been passed, a vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. H. Stannus and seconded by Mr. G. H. Clennell, and the singing of the Doxology brought the meeting to a close.

THERE is no teacher like obedience, and no obstruction like its postponement.—George Macdonald.

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

THE fourth lecture of the series on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" was delivered in Nottingham, on Monday evening, the subject being, "The Doctrine of the Word: Christianity and Greek Thought." Christianity, Mr. Carpenter said, was early brought into contact with a remarkable combination of Greek and Hebrew thought. Greek thought was chiefly concerned with speculations about the world. Hebrew interest centred rather in the destiny of man. Hellenic philosophy applied itself to explaining the relation between the passing and the eternal elements in the world. Thus arose the doctrine of ideas which sought to explain the transition from the world of spirit to that of sense. This doctrine had analogies elsewhere. Isaiah spoke of a Heavenly Sanctuary. The law had its perfect counterpart in heaven. Philo, who was steeped in Greek culture, used it in his allegorical interpretations of the Hebrew Scriptures. According to him, what knit the world together in one intellectual whole was the thought of God. Thought within expressed itself without in utterance or speech. This reason or thought of God was therefore called "logos," or the word. How was this word related to God? It was conceived as "personal," and yet it was not strictly a person. The visible world was its product. The problem soon presented itself of combining this doctrine of the logos with the Christianity of the early Church. The first attempt was made in the Epistle to the Hebrews. According to this letter the old Judaism belonged to the order of things that were passing away. In its place we had presented a heavenly sanctuary of which Christ was at once the Eternal High Priest and Victim, thereby abolishing the sacrificial requirements of the ancient law. It was a curious thing that in this Epistle there was no attempt to reconcile the earthly and heavenly life of Christ. They were simply set side by side without any scheme of connection. It offered no doctrine of incarnation or of miraculous birth.

This reconciliation was, however, attempted in the Fourth Gospel. Controversy was still busy with regard to the date and authorship of this Gospel. Some scholars argued for a time as early as 90–95 A.D., others put it as late as 135–140 A.D. The latest date which the lecturer considered reasonable was 110–115 A.D. The purpose of this document was to prove that Jesus was the Christ, not, however, in the Judaic but in a metaphysical sense. He is the logos become flesh; the dramatic and scenic apparatus of Apocalyptic Christianity disappears. Jesus comes again not with signs and portents, but invisibly, in the inward life. He is the instrument through which all manner of inward spiritual processes are wrought. This doctrine of Christ as the logos of God begat a host of problems. Two types of theories of the relation of the logos-son to the Father ultimately emerged—the "Adoptionist" and the "Consubstantialist." The lecturer then gave an account of the Arian controversy, which ended in the victory of the Consubstantialists. He pointed out a parallel development in India, whereby Gotama, who held views of a human nature without a soul and of a world without God, is himself interpreted as the self-existent and eternal Buddha, who is born and dies under the form of man in order that men may share in the Buddha nature—just as it had been argued by the Athanasians that "God became man that man might become God." Mr. Carpenter concluded with an impressive defence of the essential truth of the Athanasian idea. The doctrine, stripped of its limitations and applied universally to man, was a doctrine of profound worth. We were familiar with the statement that we lived and moved and had our being in God. But deeper truth still was this—the mystery of mysteries—that God lived and moved and had His being in us.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Ainsworth Presbyterian Chapel.—On Saturday last the Renovation Committee held another and very successful party. After tea the programme consisted of songs, recitations, and dances. Songs were given by Misses Nellie Kirkman and Dora Sellars, and Miss F. Scholes sang "A Shower of Rain," for which she received an encore, and gave "Away in Ohio." Recitations were given by Mrs. Peter Greenhalgh, who was encored, and very much appreciated. Dances were given by Miss Bessie Scholes, including Butterfly Dance, Highland Fling, Sailor's Hornpipe, &c. Rev. M. R. Scott moved a vote of thanks to the artists and all who had assisted with the party, seconded by Mr. Jesse H. Hayes; carried unanimously with loud acclamation. Mr. Glover, of Elton, officiated at the piano. About £10 was realised by the party.

Ashton under-Lyne.—The recently formed committee for the management of municipal concerts, which consists of members of the Town Council and representatives of the local churches, has elected the Rev. W. C. Hall as its vice-chairman.

Bolton District Sunday-school Union.—The annual meeting was held at Halliwell-road, Bolton, on Saturday, November 21. After tea Rev. J. Evans presided, and in moving the adoption of the annual report and financial statement, said the Union had a good record to give of its past work, but he would like to see more steps taken to obtain and publish statistics and details of the way in which their schools were carried on. He emphasised the advisability of definite and systematic instruction in the principles of our faith, and more careful and intelligent Bible teaching. He believed that the only satisfactory solution of the education difficulty would be found in removing definite religious instruction from the curriculum of the elementary schools. This would necessitate increased activity and devotion on the part of Sunday-school workers. Mr. Joseph Lancaster seconded, and the resolution was passed. The accounts showed a substantial balance in hand, notwithstanding several items of unusual expenditure. Mr. J. L. Davies (Chowbent) was elected president, and Mr. Jos. Chadderton treasurer, and Mr. Isaac Barrow secretary for the ensuing year, a cordial vote of thanks being passed to the retiring officers. A vote of condolence with Rev. P. Holt (Astley) on the death of his wife was passed. An attractive musical programme was then gone through, under the presidency of Mr. Davies. The meetings during the past year have been well attended, and have included rambles and lectures by Rev. T. P. Spedding on "Transylvania," Rev. T. Robinson on "How Plants Obtain Nourishment and Propagate their Species," Mr. J E. Jones on "The Duty of Sunday-schools in National, Social and Religious Questions," and united services were held on Whit Sunday at Bank-street, Bolton, and Chowbent.

Boston.—On Sunday week the Mayor (Alderman Joseph Cooke) attended by the Corporation, magistrates, and officials, attended, according to custom, morning service at the parish church; and in the evening, again attended by members of the Corporation, he attended the Spain-lane Unitarian Chapel, where the service was conducted by the Rev. W. Stoddart and a large congregation. Mr. Stoddart's sermon on "The Recognition of Religion by the State," is printed in full in last Saturday's Boston Guardian. Having dealt with the false theory of a State Church, the preacher showed how the true recognition of religion by the State was in just legislation and administration.

Devonport—On Sunday afternoon, the first of a series of popular services, similar to those held in London and Manchester, was held in the Metropole Theatre, Devonport. The work of organising these services has fallen upon a small but faithful band of workers. The weather on Sunday was unfortunately very bad, but a congregation of 200 attended the service and listened with evident interest to the address given by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, whose subject was "Does God Speak to Man To-day?" Mr. Bowie showed how the generally accepted doctrine of inspiration had had a mischievous effect by causing people to imagine that God had not spoken to us since the last word of the Bible was written. He was speaking through all common natural things, calling us to follow the true, the good, and the pure, and to turn our backs upon the false, the impure, and the evil. Every department of life would be the better if we listened to and obeyed the voice of God which speaks now as of old to all of us. Listening to God's voice and obeying it had made heroes and saints, it would make a great difference to our lives to-day, it would bring into our homes, our work, our politics, and our religion the spirit of honesty, of truthfulness, kindness and justice. The singing was led by the Christ Church choir, and the theatre orchestra. The congregation included a good proportion of people who do not usually attend the church, and it is hoped that under more favourable climatic conditions, the rest of the series will be better attended. Mr. Bowie preached at Christ Church in the evening to a good congregation. The Plymouth Chapel being closed in the evening, some of the congregation attended at Devonport.

Kidderminster.—On Sunday week the Mayor (Colonel Talbot), paid the customary official visit to the parish church, attending morning service. In the evening also he was largely attended when he went to service at the New Meeting. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. Whitaker, of Leicester, and the church was crowded. The sermon was based on the Deuteronomic law of the three Cities of Refuge, and was an eloquent vindication of the law of mercy as the true fulfilment of the law of justice. The conclusion of the sermon as reported in last Saturday's Kidderminster Shuttle was as follows:—"Society was riven with factions, disease lurked in their midst, poverty still raised its gruesome head, vice flourished in high places, the lives of rich and poor had not yet been cleansed from impurity, there was still a great division between the Sermon on the Mount and their actual lives. Still in the human heart there were great longings after the true, the beautiful, and the good, and there was nothing which would satisfy it short of the infinite God. Augustine declared that man was made for God and could find rest only in the eternal. In the North Country there was a saying about men when they had got past the power for work that they were only fit for the scrap-heap. God had provided no scrap-heap for the human soul. With Him failure was not a thing to be considered. Society was strewn with failures, but so long as the human soul was striving to find opportunities for development there were no failures with the Almighty. Let the law of mercy triumph, let Society strive to realise more completely the Divine law, and then acknowledging their shortcomings let them turn to the great Father who received every prodigal and bound up every broken heart, and He would say, 'Children, you have tried.' And do not let them believe that there was anything in the universe of God that could contradict that great and Divine law."

Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society.—A meeting of this society was held on the evening of Thursday, Nov. 19, in the Hope-street Church Hall, to discuss the present position of the compensation question. The Rev. H. D. Roberts presided, and there were over forty members and friends present. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong opened the discussion. After dwelling on the fact that the brewers have no legal or moral claim to compensation from public funds, he went on to say that there was no objection to the trade compensating themselves out of their own funds, and it might be advisable that Parliament should undertake the equitable distribution of such funds. He was afraid that at the present day the question of compensation was standing in the way of further temperance reform, and that the Government might endeavour to tie the hands of the licensing magistrates in the full exercise of their discretion. He alluded to the manifesto recently issued and signed by several well-known Temperance workers, which suggests some measure of compensation from the trade funds, with due safeguards, and with no bar to any other scheme of reform, such as Local Veto. Miss H. M. Johnson continued the discussion. She objected to the manifesto mainly on the ground that it suggested compensation for licences, and she advocated Lord Peel's Report, which places compensation on a basis of an unexpired time-limit. She believed that the brewers' own insurances were quite sufficient. She declared that in Victoria where this system has been tried, it has been a failure. Mr. W. H. Thomas, Mr. Fred Robinson, and Mr. W. T. Haydon also spoke. In reply, Mr. Armstrong pointed out that the manifesto was not a ready-made Bill, but a basis for negotiation on which a Bill might be framed.

London: Islington.—Last Sunday's theatre service was attended, according to a careful counting, by 924 people. The concluding service of the series is to be held to-morrow evening, when the Rev. J. Page Hopps is to speak on "A rational and humane view of a future life." The solo, "Hear, O Israel," is to be sung, and at the close the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, the recently appointed minister of Unity Church, is to have an opportunity of speaking to the people before a final singing of the Hallelujah Chorus.

London: Peckham.—On Tuesday an entertainment, under the direction of Mrs. W. J. Cooley, was givan in the Avondale Lecture Hall by senior members and friends of the Band of Hope. The programme included several part-songs and choruses, which were admirably rendered. The evening closed with a capitally-acted farce.

London (Plumstead).—On Sunday last the little church was crowded to the utmost capacity, the occasion being the attendance at morning service of the Mayor (the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, J.P.), accompanied by the Town Clerk, aldermen, and councillors. The service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, whose thoughtful and stirring address evoked numerous murmurs of assent from many of those present who heard Unitarian teaching for the first time. The evening service was conducted by Mr. Jones, who preached to a largely augmented congregation, on "The Problem of Atonement in its Relation to Experience." On Monday evening a conversazione was held, when close on a hundred members and friends attended to congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Jones on the distinction conferred upon them by the borough, and to assure them of the hearty co-operation of the Church during the coming year. On Wednesday evening the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, delivers the third in the series of lantern lectures on Evolution. For these lectures the seating accommodation of the Hall is totally inadequate.

London Sunday School Society.—The annual social meeting of teachers and elder scholars was held last Saturday evening at Essex Hall, and was very largely attended, some 200 scholars being present, representing eighteen of the London schools, about 60 teachers and a number of their friends. A very pleasant evening was spent, tea being served at six o'clock, and a high-class entertainment afterwards given, which was evidently greatly enjoyed. Mr. John Harrison, president of the society, was responsible for the programme, which, in addition to songs by Mr. Veillard and Miss Ettie Spice, included items for violin by Herr Ammon Hering, and 'cello by Miss Alice Glover. Miss Richardson was at the piano. The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor gave two of his always popular recitations, the first being Tennyson's "Window" Cycle of Songs of the Wrens, which the less experienced part of the audience took for something comic, and "Etiquette" ("Did you know Robinson?") which was enthusiastically encored. The President, in opening the proceedings, was supported on the platform by Miss Marian Pritchard (president of the Sunday-school Association), Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Mr. Alec Barnes (hon. sec. of the society). Mr. Harrison expressed his warm interest in the work of the society, and recalled the memory of his own active connection with it, when, for years he was superintendent of the Brixton School. Their Sunday-school work, he said, was likely to grow in value and importance. If the rate-aided education throughout the country became strictly secular, and that seemed likely to be the only satisfactory solution of the difficulty, in view of the doctrinal teaching of the High Church and the Orthodox Passive Resisters, then the religious instruction of the Sunday-schools would be all that many children would receive. They must therefore redouble their efforts to increase the efficiency of their schools. It was a great work, and they must be ready for the emergency. He made an earnest appeal to the young people to recognise the claim which the churches had upon their loyalty. The school was a natural preparation for the church, and he urged upon the elder scholars the duty of attending the church services. Past experience in that connection had made him sceptical as to Wordsworth's saying that "the child is father to the man." Only in the way he indicated would the Unitarian child be father to the Unitarian man. In conclusion, he acknowledged Miss Pritchard's presence on the platform, and paid a tribute of warm admiration to her work for the schools. The programme having been completed, on the motion of the Rev. Frederic Allen, a hearty vote of thanks was passed to the performers, the ladies who had provided the tea, and the president. The meeting closed with the singing of the National Anthem.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—The Rev. W. Reynolds writes to correct an impression gathered from our report of the recent Palace services in Manchester, and to say that his congregation suffered severely, because so many of his people went to help at the services. He suggests that such popular services should not be held during the ordinary hours of worship.

Middlesbrough.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held at Christ Church on the 15th inst. The Rev. F. Henning Vaughan, of Hull, was the preacher, and special hymns were sung by the scholars, assisted by the church choir. There were good congregations at both services, the church being crowded in the evening. The anniversary celebrations were continued on the following Wednesday, when a great number of people sat down to tea and very much enjoyed the entertainment which followed it. A "Kinderspiel," entitled "Rip Van Winkle," by J. C. Grieve (published by Ernest Köhler, North Bridge, Edinburgh), was most creditably performed by the scholars, assisted by the teachers. This "Kinderspiel" is really good, the music being exceedingly good and pretty. The entertainment was repeated the following evening, and again the school-room was well filled. The anniversary celebrations this year have been the most successful that have been held at Christ Church Sunday-school.

Northampton: Kettering-road Church.—For some time past the members of the Ladies' Social Working Party have been busily engaged in furnishing a stall for a bazaar lately held in the town to promote the general efficiency of the Association of the Blind. Great satisfaction was felt by all concerned when it was known that the sum of £33 was realised by the united efforts of members and friends. At the celebrations of the National Lifeboat Institution on Saturday and Sunday, considerable assistance was given by the Church Committee in granting the free use of the building for a public meeting on Sunday evening after the usual service. The Rev. Arthur Harvey took the chair, and, in the course of his address, reminded his hearers that the church was built for the use of the congregation and for any worthy object, and he could conceive of no worthier object than the Lifeboat Fund. Mr. Charles E. Fish, ex-coxswain of the Ramsgate lifeboat, gave a very telling and descriptive narrative showing the hardships of the men who serve on lifeboats. The collection in aid of the institution amounted to £3 5s.

Rochdale.—In fulfilment of a promise made to the late Rev. Thomas Carter many years ago, Mr. G. J. Holyoake gave an address on Sunday evening in the Unitarian Church, Blackwater-street. There was a crowded congregation, including many old friends of the distinguished speaker. Mr. Holyoake's association with Rochdale extends over more than sixty years. It was as a disciple of Robert Owen that he first came to the town, and his lectures had no small influence in banding together the weavers and others who, in 1844, established the Equitable Pioneers' Co-operative Society. Later he wrote a "History of the Pioneers," a little book that had great vogue, and was a powerful help in the extension of the movement. It was while on a visit to the local veteran of the movement, Mr. Abraham Greenwood, that he kept his promise to speak in the Unitarian church. The service was conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding from the chancel, and Mr. Holyoake, who occupied the pulpit, took for the subject of his address "Wayside Wisdom," recalling some of his old Rochdale memories. The Rochdale Observer of November 25 gives a full report of the address.

Tavistock.—Professor Worthington gave a lecture on Sunday week after evening service in the Abbey Chapel on "Marvels of Instantaneous Photography illustrating the Story of a Drop." Numerous limelight pictures showing a drop of water and a drop of milk in the various stages of their descent and their effect on the liquid into which they fell, were shown on the screen. The details of what happened when a marble with a rough surface and another with a partially dust-covered surface severally fell into a pool of water were also shown, and the similar effect of a heavy shot penetrating an iron plate, photographed at the moment of impact.

Walmsley (Resignation).—After a ministry extending over twenty-five years, the Rev. Edward Allen is retiring from the charge of Walmsley Chapel, and last Sunday evening, at a special meeting of the trustees and congregation, a resolution regretfully accepting his resignation, and expressing a deep sense of gratitude and appreciation of his faithful services to school and chapel, was unanimously passed. Many other friends in the province and throughout the country will unite with the congregation in these expressions of warm regard and good wishes for Mr. Allen.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—To last week's list of congregations taking part in the bazaar that of Whitby should have been added.

CHRISTIANITY IN TALMUD AND MIDRASH. By R. TRAVERS HERFORD, B.A.

'The great host of books which have been written upon the early history of Christianity are almost entirely based upon the study of Christian documents. This of course is natural, and no investigation which should neglect these documents would lead to results of any value. But the field of inquiry is not exhausted when the Christian literature has been thoroughly explored. There is a Jewish literature which also needs to be examined. It is the object of this book to try and present that material with some approach to completeness, in order to put within the reach of scholars who have not access to the Rabbinical literature, the full text of the passages bearing on the subject, together with translation and commentary. It is hoped that this may be the means of supplying a want that as yet remains unsatisfied, viz., of a work that shall let the Christian scholar know what the Rabbinical literature really does contain bearing on the origin and early history of Christianity."—PREFACE.

MY STRUGGLE FOR LIGHT: Confessions of a Preacher. By R. WIMMER.

The Pastor of Weisweil-am-Rhein in Baden is well known to a large circle of his countrymen through his published works, of which that now presented in an English dress is the most popular.

Originally educated in a conservative school of Theology, the author gradually progressed to more liberal ideas. In this book he describes the struggle through which he passed when endeavouring to reconcile faith with reason, and sets forth the conclusions at which he arrived.

HIGHGATE UNITARIAN CHURCH and its twin sister institution, the CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, were founded in 1885 by the joint efforts of the MISSES EMILY and MATILDA SHARPE and the late Rev. ROBERT SPEARS. Aided by many generous friends, and under the fostering care of the London District Unitarian Society, the Church grew, till in 1895 it was enabled to throw off its leading strings and to take an independent position among the London Churches. As Pastor of this Church, MR. SPEARS ever strove to associate with its Services, institutions of public beneficence: and, amongst other efforts, in 1890 founded, in a very small, tentative way, a Free Lending Library of general literature, at the same time throwing open the Schoolroom on four nights of each week as a Public Reading Room, well supplied with Newspapers, Magazines, and Books. The success that from the outset attended these two experiments, though gratifying to their promoters, had necessarily the effect of restricting the use to which the rooms could otherwise have been devoted, particularly in carrying on institutions more generally associated with Church activities. Thus, the demand for further accommodation may be said to have arisen as far back as 1890. MR. SPEARS early realised this, and had plans drawn out for extending the premises over the vacant ground at his disposal. Circumstances, however, prevented him at the time from carrying out the project in its entirety, and his lamented death in 1899 left the work only partially completed. Now, however, with the opening of a new chapter in the Church history, it was felt to be singularly appropriate to complete the work, dedicating it as a most fitting memorial to the devoted zeal of its initiator, and the New Buildings are the fulfilment of that idea. They have cost £2,253 4s. 11d. Towards this amount the congregation has contributed £797 2s. 3d., whilst £464 8s. has been received from sympathising friends.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE British Ambassador at Constantinople has written to Lord Lansdowne, enclosing a report of the Consul-General at Salonika, on the terrible distress now prevailing in the ravaged districts of Macedonia, and the efforts being made to relieve it. Sir N. O'Conor warmly endorses the appeal to the people of England for help.

THE Bishops of Durham, Hereford, Liverpool, London, Rochester, and Worcester, and the Revs. R. J. Campbell, R. F. Horton, C. H. Kelly, and F. B. Meyer are issuing the following appeal on behalf of the sufferers in Macedonia :—

We venture to appeal to the ministers of religion in this country for a continuous and public intercession on behalf of the peoples of Macedonia. Sunday, December 20, has been suggested as a day of special prayer for this purpose, where another has not fixed. When possible, a sermon should be preached to inform worshippers as to the state of things which so urgently calls for prayer, and as to our national responsibility on the matter, and a collection made for the Macedonian Relief Fund, of which the treasurer is Sir T. Fowell Buxton, Bart., 116, Victoria-street, Westminster.

THE terrible accounts sent home by Messrs. Nevinson and Brailsford of the destitution prevailing in Macedonia as the result of the havoc wrought by the Turk in suppressing the rebellion of last summer must appeal strongly to the compassion and generosity of people at home. We in our comfortable homes have had a foretaste this week of the discomfort winter brings even in temperate England to the well clothed and decently housed. What it must mean in the snowy Balkans to those whose homes have been rased to the ground, whose crops have been destroyed and whose bread-winners have died fighting for freedom, can only be guessed at. Mr. Brailsford describes the shelters made of straw-thatch roofs, built up against mud walls, in one of which a party of twenty-nine have been reduced by seven within ten days through the hardships endured. He describes his desperate efforts to replace the bedding, coats, and blankets burned and looted. "At present," he says, "I am able to give only one blanket to each family. They are large and warm, no doubt, but to send one blanket to ten or twelve persons who are all sleeping practically in the open in the rags of their summer clothes seems almost a mockery of their misery. Later I hope that it may be possible to be less niggardly, but that depends on the generosity of England."

BUT for England and the "peace with honour" she secured at Berlin in 1878, Macedonia, we cannot too often remind ourselves, would now be as peaceful and prosperous as Bulgaria. It is our manifest duty, therefore, to do what in us lies to abate the worst and most immediate effects of the callous policy which has left these people so long at the mercy of the Turk. But our duty does not end here. Winter has put an end for the moment both to rebellion and to direct massacre by the sword, though the steady stream of deaths from exposure and starvation started by the summer's ravages still continues. But "when the snows melt," unless something effectual is done by one or other or all the Powers, the rebellion must inevitably be renewed, this time with the open participation of Bulgaria, and the Turk must renew retaliatory methods after his kind.

THE Sultan continues to play with the demands of Russia and Austria, and confidence in the effectiveness of the intervention of these Powers on the lines they have laid down for themselves is steadily diminishing. England must intervene, with or without the support of France and Italy. A definite announcement that the Mediterranean Squadron was about to make a demonstration at Salonika, and to require the Sultan forthwith to surrender his authority in Macedonia into the hands of a European governer responsible to as many of the Powers as chose to come to our side, would be hailed with a sigh of relief throughout Western Europe, and would enlist in its support an international public opinion which Austria and Russia could not, and in all probability would not desire to resist.

THE reconstructed Cabinet perseveres in its determination to attempt another Parliamentary session, and has been hard at work at the usual series of Autumn Councils for the preparation of its legislative programme. Though we are in theory rushing as fast as we can upon national ruin through "our obstinate adhesion to the policy of free imports," we are to be invited to do nothing at all in the matter for, at least, another Parliamentary year, but tranquilly to take up the task of domestic legislation as though all were for the best in the best of all possible worlds. The plan fails to reckon with two very important factors in the political situation—the sincere Free Traders and the sincere Protectionists, neither of whom can or will acquiesce in the shelving of so vital a matter. The issue has been raised and it must be fought out, and Ministers are not likely to succeed for long in their [illegible] of maintaining a balance between the two and turning the energies of Parliament to the discussion of other themes.

IT would be a mistake, nevertheless, to treat too lightly the forecasts of the legislation to which Parliament, in these extraordinary circumstances, is to be invited to give its attention. A liquor trade endowment Bill and some sort of project of army reform seem to be the most prominent items in the programme, and a determined attempt is certain to be made to secure that the Liquor Bill, at any rate, shall get through before the expected disaster comes. And it is to be feared that many members of Parliament who are anxious, from one motive or the other, that the tariff issue shall be promptly settled, will be willing enough to pass first a brief Bill calculated to secure them the vigorous support of the powerful liquor interest when the general election comes. All, therefore, who are concerned that the path of temperance reform shall not be blocked by an enormous gratuitous appreciation in the money value of superfluous liquor licences should prepare for a very vigorous campaign against the forces of reaction early in the coming year.

FOR centuries past licences for the sale of intoxicants have been held subject to the unfettered discretion of the local licensing authority to revoke or modify those licences wherever and whenever the public interest appears to them to require such a step, and licensed property has been bought and sold through the years on that understanding. To abolish that discretion, or to qualify it by making its exercise conditional on grants of compensation out of public funds, is simply to make a present to an already wealthy interest of an enormous increase in the market value of the property it holds. We may or may not be willing, on the lines of Lord Peel's report, to give legislative sanction to the creation of a fund out of which licensees retaining their licences shall pay compensation to those of their colleagues whose licences are withdrawn, in consideration of the withdrawal of their competition. But if we desire at all that the infirm among us shall be eased of the temptations offered by the present scandalously excessive facilities for over-indulgence, we must set out faces as a rock against any legislation which shall recognise any vested right, to be bought out from the National Exchequer, to continue the sale of intoxicants in districts already supplied beyond what can, by any stretch of imagination, be described as their "legitimate needs."

THE visit of British members of Parliament to France as a reciprocal expression of cordiality to that of the French Senators and Deputies who came to England last summer has been received in Paris with great hospitality and goodwill. Between the two visits the Anglo-French Arbitration Agreement has been signed. The many receptions culminated in that by President Loubet at the Elysée, at which Baron d'Estournelles de Constant presented the British Members of Parliament. These things help to establish goodwill and good understanding between the nations, and will, we sincerely hope, produce a sentiment and desire on the part of legislators in both countries to treat definite and practical affairs affecting the interests of the two countries, with mutual consideration and forbearance whenever matters arise which are difficult of adjustment.

THE question of unemployment is a pressing one, as indeed it has been during several generations. What is new is not the problem, but the serious attention that it is attracting in various directions. A few weeks ago we noticed the conference of Free Churches on this subject. A proposal for dealing with it has now been set before the public in a letter to the daily press signed by the Bishop and the Mayor of Stepney, Canon Barnet, Rev. Peter Thompson, Mr. F. N. Charrington, Mr. W. C. Steadman, L.C.C., and others. This Stepney scheme is designed to provide work for men who are willing to work, utilising for this purpose the colony of the Salvation Army at Hadleigh, that of the Christian Union for Social Service at Lingfield, and Osea Island recently acquired by Mr. Charrington for the purpose of an inebriate retreat. If the requisite funds are forthcoming a certain number of men can at once be set on useful work at these places. Many of the local authorities are also alive to the serious nature of the problem, and are endeavouring by a re-arrangement of work to provide for the period of slack employment and destitution which will be very keen if the weather should become really severe.

CANON BARNET has explained to a Daily News interviewer that the wages to be paid should be sufficient to maintain the men and their families in comfort, a condition sometimes neglected in relief works. The result of this would be that "they will return to London when the hard times are over hugely improved. Under other systems the poor fellows have only been but partly fed, and so have become unfit for work when that work arrived." The Stepney scheme may be open to criticism; it does not, of course, deal with the whole problem, because the ranks of the unemployed are largely recruited from those who are not suited for work upon the land. But as far as it goes, it seems to be sound, and it is all to the good that the duty of finding work for the workless should be thus prominently brought to the front. It is to be hoped, however, that we shall not have a number of sectional funds, but that the different people and societies who are working in the same direction will be able to act in concert, or even to form one central committee representative of all the religious societies.

A VERY wise and suggestive little booklet, entitled "The Beginnings of Education," by Miss Margaret MacMillan, has just been issued by the City branch of the I.L.P. It will be a pity if its paper covers and low price should lead to its being regarded as of merely passing interest. Miss McMillan's experience as a member of the Bradford School Board, enforced by her sympathy with children, and a certain ethical enthusiasm, find their issue in these pages of valuable thought. It is worth the consideration of our Sunday School Associations whether an effort should not be made to bring it under the notice of the teachers.

THE central thought of the pamphlet is contained in the remark that teachers have to "deal with children during that phase of human life which is now called by psychologists the 'art period,' that is to say, the period during which the intellectual and moral faculties depend on the expression of the growing creative power through free art. 'Imagination,' said Goethe, 'is the forerunner of reason.' If you crush a child's fancies you crush his reason, just as you destroy a fruit when you tear or trample the apple blossom." But imagination demands expression, and, accordingly, Miss McMillan lays stress on the importance of a larger place being given to the cultivation of the child's implicit powers. An instance which she gives of a child of twelve who thought that "the rainbow is mostly white and brown" is evidence of the crippled sense of sight among city children. They find it difficult to see anything unless it is near at hand, and for this the fact that the vision is habitually surrounded by the near lines of monotonous streets may be in part responsible. The greater need for light, and for things of beauty to see and enjoy in the course of education.

THERE is another interesting suggestion, that in the planning of schools the parents ought to be considered as well as the children; that good would accrue to all, teachers included, by bringing mothers and fathers into closer touch with the schools and so arousing a deeper sympathy with education. Among other subjects dealt with is that of the physical condition of the children which clearly has an important bearing on the power of the children to enjoy any education at all. Miss McMillan makes the startling statement, on the result of a medical examination, that in one school, out of 285 children "the general nutrition of five left nothing to be desired." This is a fact which, following as it does recent revelations as to the physical deficiency of town-bred children, is "suggestive of much."

A USEFUL and humane experiment is being tried on the steep hill that leads from Norwood to the Crystal Palace. The local secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has been enabled, from funds supplied by some ladies residing in that district, to provide a traction engine to help the horses of heavily laden vehicles up the hill. The use of the engine is given free of charge, and when not in use it is kept in a house provided by the directors of the Palace. There must be many lovers of animals in other hilly suburbs, such, e.g., as Hampstead and Highgate, who would be glad to imitate this practice, and so to relieve the strain upon horses, who are often seen struggling with loads far beyond their strength. If only a few more experiments were made, and the value for our humanity, as well as of the animals, of such a plan were further demonstrated, it should then become possible to obtain local byelaws under which the Councils might provide the engines, and the use of them be made compulsory.

THE Brabazon Employment Society was founded twenty years ago by the Countess of Meath, then Lady Brabazon, to make life more interesting to inmates of the workhouses exempted by the Board of Guardians from the regulation tasks of th house. The old folks are taught to do light and interesting work (if they need the lesson), sewing, knitting, wool-work, netting, mat making, &c. Materials are provided, and the articles produced are sold at an annual sale held at the workhouse. This scheme has been adopted in 300 workhouses. It is mainly worked by ladies with the concurrence of the guardians and officials. The proceeds of the annual sale, after paying the cost of materials, are used to provide little pleasures or comforts for the inmates who have done the work—tea, tobacco, biscuits, or a country ride, for example, as each may choose. Each branch is self-supporting. The need, therefore, in furtherance of the work is not for large subscriptions, but for willing helpers in each district who will give some of their time to a most useful effort. In unions where there is no Brabazon Employment Scheme in operation, a few ladies might readily form the nucleus of such a society. They could obtain all necessary information from the secretary, 39, Victoria-street, London, S.W., and it is usually found that the master of the workhouse is willing to co-operate, and the guardians to sanction such beneficent work.

THE HOWARD ASSOCIATION.

THE annual report of the Howard Association, just issued, contains many points of interest. The committee press upon the notice of the Prisons Commissioners the need for more reformatory training for women prisoners, for the appointment of female inspectors of prisons for women, and for more helpful intercourse with persons likely to exercise a good influence over prisoners; and they desire that the attempt should be made to provide better means of bridging the gulf that now divides the mechanical routine of prison life from the temptations of free life outside. They also urge the further adoption of the "probation" system, which has saved so many young offenders in America from prison life; the fuller training of prison warders, and the improvement of their position in the matter of pensions; and the final discontinuance of flogging, as a punishment for breaches of prison discipline. The Irish Prisons Board is asked to secure an alteration of the rules in order that (as in England) remission of part of a prisoner's sentence may be obtained by good behaviour in local as well as in convict prisons; and the desirability is urged of establishing more reformatories for inebriates.

Much literature has, as usual, been distributed, including a pamphlet on "Prison Industries," by Mr. Edward Grubb, the Secretary, and papers on "The Housing Problem," "The Rural Exodus," and "Can Prisons Reform Men?" A pamphlet on "The Probation System in America," by Miss E. P. Hughes, is in course of distribution.

The most interesting part of the report deals with the subjects of lynching and of the treatment of coloured prisoners in some of the States of America. An appeal on "The Evils of Lynching and Convict Camps" was sent to the chief American newspapers; and the same subject was brought by the secretary before a standing committee of the Society of Friends, who issued some 30,000 copies of "A Plea for Humanity" to newspapers and ministers of religion in the States where lynchings have occurred.

The revival of slavery, in the form of "Peonage," in Georgia and Alabama, which has been made the subject of prosecutions by the Federal authorities, is alluded to, and a horrible instance is given of the cruelties associated with it. A chief reason why such crimes have been allowed to go on, in States not destitute of humane and public-spirited citizens, is declared to be the fear on the part of anyone inclined to make a protest, lest he should be charged with disloyalty to the white section, and with desiring to encourage social equality with the negro race.

THE Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth, who recently concluded his ministry at Newhall Hill, Birmingham, was to leave this week for Brussels, and proposes to take a few months' holiday abroad before taking up active work again.

LITERATURE.

SOME PHILOSOPHICAL BOOKS.*

IT was Dr. Everett's custom to divide his course of instruction in the Harvard Divinity School into two portions, the first dealing with the bases of religion in human nature, and the second with special questions in theology. The first course has been published since the Professor's lamented death. The material had to be compiled entirely from students' notes, as Dr. Everett never wrote out his lectures. The result is the interesting volume which stands first on the list mentioned below. Although the lectures appear in a condensed form, they have, under the careful editorship of Professor Hale, of the Harvard Divinity School, by no means lost the qualities of style and matter which made them so impressive to all who heard them. The book does not contain a complete "philosophy of religion," but an account or analysis of the elements (emotional and intellectual) in human nature which lead to religious beliefs. Anything more than a bare indication of the mode of treatment is not possible in this place. The lecturer's aim is to give an explanation of religious belief which shall afford a means of critically distinguishing between its higher and lower forms. The fundamental element in religion is held to be not thought or will but feeling. The frank and skilful way in which this conception is worked out lends special interest to the book. Feeling, it is held, becomes religious when manifested towards the supernatural, which, on the intellectual side, is the basal conception in religion. This idea, of course, is capable of indefinitely various forms; and in the highest religions, the supernatural is regarded as manifesting itself in the ideals of truth, beauty, and goodness. The importance assigned to feeling constitutes a much-needed protest against the current tendency (especially among Hegelian "idealists") to assume that reason somehow creates religion, whereas in reality reason interprets it; but on the other hand, in his explanation of the ideas of truth, beauty, and goodness in their religious significance, Dr. Everett lays a one-sided stress on the mere notion of unity, as if that were the all-important thing in the highest human ideals. This is a characteristic of nineteenth century "idealism," which sometimes even provokes the reflection "it's all one," the ambiguity of which might be a lesson to "idealists."

Mr. Frederick Harrison, in his interesting introduction to M. Lévy-Bruhl's account of the philosophy of Comte, which now appears in a good English translation, states that "Professor Lévy-Bruhl writes as a student, but not as an adherent of Auguste Comte; his entire work is rather an exposition, not a refutation, or a criticism, or an advocacy of Comte's philosophical system; but it may be said at once that no one abroad or at home, certainly neither Mill, nor Lewes, nor Spencer, nor Caird, has so truly grasped and assimilated Comte's ideas as Mr. Lévy-Bruhl has done." The "exposition" is certainly sympathetic in the extreme; one would have expected to find more discussion of the criticisms to which Comte's scheme is universally admitted (save by his devoted adherents) to be open, criticisms which it would be ridiculous to ascribe to any mere misunderstanding; as, for instance, on the question of the so-called "Law of Three Stages," and on the difficulties of introspective psychology. However, there is not the least doubt that the author is a thoroughly competent expositor, and he writes in that brilliantly lucid style which seems to come naturally to French writers, even on the most abstruse subjects.

Mr. John M. Robertson occasionally repels by his habit of writing, as if he were conscious of a unique mission to enlighten humanity, and especially to destroy Christianity and other evils. The essays contained in the volume mentioned below were for the most part delivered as lectures. They deal in an interesting way with various subjects of practical importance, such as "The Ethics of Propaganda," "Compromise," "International Ethics," "Equality," "The Ethics of Vivisection." He considers the South African war to be "the great test question" in present-day ethics.

The author of "God and the Agnostics, or the End of the Age of Faith," differs from most Englishmen in that he is able to read philosophical books. He has read widely, but we fear that the results of the reading are not very well digested. He writes in an exceedingly vivacious and unconventional style, which he perhaps intends to explain by observing in the preface that "he has lived many years in Australia, where much less respect is paid to convention than in England or other old-world countries." We have found his book very interesting reading. His position may be described as Humanism, and is opposed equally to Agnosticism, Theism, and Materialism. He is convinced that "the founder of Christianity stood at a level to which even the European world has not yet risen" (the "even" scarcely seems required). With regard to the central problem of religious thought, his conclusion is as follows:—

To postulate God is to assume that the constitution of the universe is such as to allow of the continual emergence of higher and higher forms of reality, to assume that all things co-operate to produce a higher and higher result We ourselves are the result of this universal co-operation . . . But we work towards a still higher result, namely, towards the realisation of a better social state, and not only that, but towards the realisation of a higher personality.

The last two volumes on our list, from the pen of that ready writer, the editor of The Monist, explain and defend, from various points of view, the solution of the mystery of "mind and matter," which regards them as two "sides" or "aspects" of one fundamental reality.

PROBLEMS OF LIVING.*

ALL who know J. B.'s previous work will welcome this new volume. There are those who buy the Christian World for the sake of J. B.'s essays. It is to be hoped that none who buy the paper leave the essays unread. And it is good to have them in less ephemeral form. Mr. Brierley's thought is worth having by one. His books are worth taking down from the shelf from time to time and dipping into here and there as one would have a chat with a wise and kindly friend on serious things.

There is no evidence in this new volume of an exhausted spring, the flow is rather fuller. There is the same charm of style and lightness of touch, the same richness of suggestion and interest of illustration, together with the same happy absence of the violence of thought and expression, the endeavour to startle and the gloating in eccentricity which characterise certain other essayists on religious, ethical, and social subjects in the weekly and daily press. Mr. Brierley's strength is in his quietness.

While the thirty-six essays of which the volume is composed deal with a wide range of subjects connected with personal religion and individual and social ethics, a considerable section has to do with the decay of dogma, which is emphasised and supported. The abandonment of the old Christian phrases, it is pointed out, means in every case the attainment of wider and greater truth. But still the author appears to rest on the ethical teaching of the Gospel as the perfect. It may be questioned whether in some cases the teaching is the best, and in others, admirable as Mr. Brierley's interpretation is in itself, whether it is legitimate to attribute his meaning to the Gospel saying. Anything can be interpreted to mean almost anything. Only in a small proportion of cases is it legitimate to attribute the interpretation to that which is interpreted. The interpreter is always an important, often the most important factor. It is so in the case of the interpretation of some Gospel ethics. It is common for an interpretation to be given impossible in the nature of things to Gospel time. Such interpretations belong not to the Bible, but to the human heart, to man, who is the interpreter. Man is greater than the Bible, and there is progress. The focusing upon the past what was impossible to that past hinders the progress of religion; retards, though it cannot prevent, the attainment of the fundamental necessity, a fuller and a universal recognition of to-day, and neither yesterday nor to-morrow, as the centre of gravity of the religious life. To-day's thought in connection with the words, "resist not evil," for instance (a case Mr. Brierley takes), was clearly impossible, if only because too abstract for Judæa, to Jesus, or to the compiler of "Proverbs."

The author is right in not defining Christianity in these days. The creeds no longer define it. It is coming to be recognised that Christianity is the name for the two Commandments, and whatever a man thinks right. That which was the essential in Christianity no longer necessarily belongs to it. It is not justification that men care about to-day, as Mr. Brierley well points out, but justice. Not justification by faith, but justice between nation and nation, and between class and class. And if it is also well that theological students should study percentages of work and wages, the cubic feet of air allotted in workrooms and sleeping places, and the death rate in certain trades, and these things Mr. Brierley says they are told to study, let them not preach these things when they leave college. That is not their business. The answers to social and economic problems are not for the preacher of religion to give. His duty is to impress upon his hearers the improtance of these problems, the imperative duty of everyone to study them as best he can, and, most important of all, to teach the spirit in which they should be approached and grappled with.

This book is confidently to be commended to the general reader. It is not a book for the specialist, theological or philosophical. Let no possible buyer unacquainted with J. B.'s pervious work be deterred by the title; and if, having bought, he does not find the thread of the first essay at once easy to catch, or if neither of the first two essays appeals especially to him, let him, by no means, lay the book aside, but dip into the middle. BLOSSOM BUDS.*

READERS of the volume on "Liberal Religious Thought at the beginning of the Twentieth Century" will remember the name of the Rev. F. C. Fleischer as author of an interesting paper on the Dutch Mennonite Community to which he belongs; and at the meetings of the International Council, in London, in 1901, and this year at Amsterdam, many of our friends had opportunities of making his personal acquaintance. Mr. Fleischer's interest in Unitarianism is shown by an article he recently contributed to de Tijdspiegel on De Unitariërs in Het Vereenigd Koninkrijk, in which he displays a remarkable familiarity with the past history and present position of Unitarianism in this country.†

The sermons in this volume, to which Mr. Fleischer has given the title "Bloesemknoppen" (Blossom Buds) are permeated, as the title suggests, by a poetical spirit, and reveal in the preacher no small gift of imagination, which is not only displayed in many delightful descriptive passages, but is, in some measure, the secret of his sympathy with the tempted, the tried, and the suffering; at the same time they are marked by an ardent piety which is the outcome of a deeply religious nature.

If we might couple terms which are not often found in conjunction, we should be inclined to describe the religion of the sermons as Evangelical Theism. They have all the warmth and earnestness and care for souls which is usually associated with evangelicalism, but with an entire absence of all "orthodox" theology; the theology is that of the Psalms and the Gospels. Mr. Fleischer assumes the critical point of view, and treats the Bible with the utmost freedom as religious literature. In the opening sentences of the first sermon he gives the key to his conception of the earliest books in the Bible; the subject is Jacob's dream (Luz-Bethel). This most beautiful legend, he says, comes down to us from ancient times, when thought and poetry were one, and the song was reckoned wisdom, when it was still held true, as the Greek singer said, that "dreams are communications from God." After an impressive and at the same time picturesque paraphase of the story of Jacob's dream, it is enlarged upon and applied with great insight to various circumstances in life, the preacher dwelling with special force upon the truth that we are often unexpectedly led to feel—"Lo, God is here, and we knew it not!" Some of the other sermons are worked out in the same way; an incident is treated quite freely, and some lessons of life and religion effectively drawn from it. The sermon, "In the Wilderness of Life" is based on the temptation of Jesus. Of this legend Mr. Fleischer says:—

> Here no historian is speaking, no biographer, but a poet. An ancient Goethe who creates a Mephistopheles; and what a Mephisto! How crafty, how fluent! He speaks to every one in his own language, and to the Son of God he speaks in the language of the Psalmists and Prophets. How seductive, how diabolically cunning!

The tempter comes to the pure in heart and is foiled—that is the subject. But the tempter is the world with its allurements and deceits, and the preacher enlarges upon the various temptations with which society endeavours to betray the pure in heart. "At the Cave of Suffering" is on Mary at the sepulchre, and another of the same class is "The Anointing at Bethany." One sermon is on "Soul-light," "the spirit of man is the lamp of the Lord," and others are "A pure heart and a steadfast spirit," "Seek God while He may be found," and "Sickness and happiness."

These sermons, of which there are only nine in all, give us an interesting glimpse into the inwardness of liberal religion in Holland, and we are grateful to Mr. Fleischer for setting it so clearly and at the same time so devoutly before us. It would not be possible without quoting passages at length, and in Dutch rather than in English, to convey any idea of the preacher's style; for, though these discourses are printed, they have all the effect of spontaneous delivery, with their short sentences, emphatic repetitions, and earnest appeals to the feelings as well as to the intelligence and imagination of his hearers.

THE POEM OF JOB.*

MISS PRITCHARD professes not to be acquainted with Hebrew, but we are not sure whether this is merely a manner of speaking. At any rate, all she claims is to have compared together the versions of a number of the best modern scholars, and to have composed her translation from theirs, nowhere adopting a rendering without learned support. Aided by a familiar study of the book itself and a definite idea as to the aim of its author, she has produced on these lines a version which is clear and self-consistent, and which may be unreservedly commended to those English readers who are puzzled by the obscurities of Job in the ordinary English Bible. Miss Pritchard has been enabled to avoid some of the difficulties of the book by the courage with which she accepts and applies the theory of interpolation. On this ground she deletes eight chapters completely, and fragments from eighteen other chapters. For most, if not all of these omissions, she has no doubt good authority; but it is very doubtful if her theory that the motive of interpolation was the desire to prove the orthodoxy of the book can be pushed so far. It will explain the epilogue, but not, really, the Elihu speeches. The fact is that the author of Job was an obscure writer, like Browning or Meredith, and his text was easily corrupted, in the main from perfectly natural causes. In spite of her rigour in excluding, Miss Pritchard retains the prologue. In honesty we must confess that the rhythm of Miss Pritchard's rendering does not always please us. A preponderance of anapæsts produces sometimes an incongruous effect, and now and again accidental rhymes have been allowed to stand. The analyses and notes which accompany the version are brief but sound, but the printer has dealt hardly with the names of Montefiore, Delitzsch, and Bickell.

In her introduction, Miss Pritchard puts forward a theory of the motive of the production of Job which is, so far as we know, entirely new. She notes the correspondences between the evils threatened against disobedient Israel in Deuteronomy, and the sufferings which actually fell upon Job, and she points out how strongly in Deuteronomy the doctrine is put forward of material prosperity as the divine reward of obedience to the law of the covenant. She argues, accordingly, that just as Ruth was probably a book of protest against the rigidity of the law in regard to marriage with aliens, so the original Book of Job may have been produced as a protest specifically against the teaching of Deuteronomy in regard to the fortunes of the righteous. The law itself accepted the test of experience as the principle by which true prophecy was to be distinguished from false. By that test the doctrine of the Law was untrue. The author of Job had the courage to contest the teaching, in spite of its great authority, and in his book he affirmed that material fortunes are not causally connected with moral states. Miss Pritchard puts forward her suggestion with great diffidence, but it seems to us an ingenious and plausible theory. Its chief difficulty would be the reception of the poem into the canon of the sacred writings. It is easy to explain the acceptance of Ruth, for that dealt with the family history of David. But if Job were a heterodox book at the start, there was no reason for its adoption, no reason for the laborious correction of its teaching. Had it been regarded as the work of a Moses or any other great teacher the case would have been different; that would have lifted it into the canon in the same way in which the Song of Solomon and perhaps Ecclesiastes were included. On the other hand, Miss Pritchard's case might be strengthened by the interpretation which sees in Job not any chance individual, but a type of suffering Israel. This improves the connection with Deuteronomy a great deal; for the passages there are national, and not individual. Further support might also be found in the so-called non-Hebraic character of the poem. It might be urged that this is the result of the author's unwillingness to appear directly in conflict with the sacred law of his own people.

Miss Pritchard is not the first lady to issue a translation of Job. A version, by Elizabeth Smith, was issued in 1810, which was accepted as an excellent piece of work at its date. Miss Pritchard's work worthily sustains the honourable precedent. J. H. WEATHERALL.

THE Girls' Guild Committee, a Free Church organisation with aims similar to those of the Church of England Girls' Friendly Society, has been holding conference, and reports good progress in various parts of the country. Papers were read by the Hon. Mrs. Bertrand Russell, who herself has worked as a factory girl at a rope factory, on the life of these girls; and by Miss Simmons, of the Bermondsey Settlement on the ever interesting subject of "Servants: Whose fault is it that domestic service is so unsatisfactory?" One branch of the committee's work is the providing of clubs. Cheap restaurants for girls are especially needed. For while the coffee houses are not always too comfortable, and the girls may not linger in them, the public-houses are attractive, and they are not hurried away from them. Accordingly, our friends of the orthodox Free Churches organise in order to make life a little more wholesome and humane for the working girl.

A CONFERENCE of nearly three hundred representatives from the various English quarterly meetings of the Society of Friends met at York from the 23rd to the 25th ult., to consider the question of the ministry in their meetings. Valuable papers were read by H. Ll. Wilson and W. C. Braithwaite, and were followed by free discussion of the whole question. The custom of the "Recording" or "Acknowledgment" of ministers was much debated, but the conference was not prepared to recommend any fundamental change in this matter. It was decided to publish the two papers, and to ask the yearly meeting to appoint, during its May sittings, a special conference with younger Friends, in which the opportunities, responsibilities, and privileges of the ministry might be fully laid before them.

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE TWO NATURES.

IN his fifth lecture at Nottingham on Monday, Mr. Carpenter pointed out that the decision at Nicæa in 325 only begot a fresh series of problems, in the necessity of determining how the union of the divine Word with the manhood of Jesus was to be understood. After adverting to the different conditions of the doctrine in India, where it was not complicated by any element of sacrifice, and then describing the various influences, religious, political, and ecclesiastical, which operated on Christian theologians, the lecturer showed how the question might be approached from the side of the manhood or from that of the Godhead. The first method started with the Gospels, and laid stress on the elements of human experience, such as growth and freewill; and this was illustrated by the theology of Antioch in the person of Theodore of Mopsuestia. The second laid stress on the immutability of the divine element, and found a representative in Apollinaris, who conceived that the Word had taken the place in Jesus of the human nous or intelligence. After sketching the course of controversy through the mutual oppositions of Nestoriu and Cyril the lecturer described the incidents that led to the settlement of Chalcedon (451 A.D.), the terms of which were followed by the clauses of the Quicunque vult. The principles of Athanasius really led to some doctrine of the monophysite type; the formula of Chalcedon, however, though it did not show a firm basis in the historical record, like the Antiochan Christology, did not let the humanity go. The contradiction was left unresolved: but Christ, whatever else he might be, was still a man.

During the latter part of the last century, the question had been revived in English theology by the transference of the centre of interest from the Atonement to the Incarnation. No one had been franker in his recognition of the Gospel facts of the growth, the moral experience, the human emotion, of Jesus, than Dr. Gore. After illustrating the earlier explanations of Christ's "economic ignorance," the lecturer sketched different types of the doctrine of the divine "self-emptying" (Kenosis), and dwelt on the difficulties which they involved. How could the divine Word be conceived as divesting himself of his omniscience? Where knowledge and being were inseparable, how could the Word part even with his own consciousness of his eternal dignity? And yet greater perplexities were involved in the temporary surrender of the omnipotence with which the Word was supposed to maintain the physical energies of the universe. On the one hand, we were told that he was at the same moment "in his mother's arms and on the wings of the wind"; on the other, that he had ceased to live the life of Godhead and exercise his cosmic functions. Similar confusions arose in the attempt to describe the Word as "quiescent" or "holding itself in reserve" in the field of moral action, so that Christ might be conceived as really subject to temptation. Finally, the doctrine that Christ was not an individual but Man, invented in order to justify the proposition that the benefits of the Incarnation extended not only to a single person but to the whole race, turned Jesus into an abstraction which could have no existence save in thought, and could not appear in the field of history. The chapter was a painful one in the long courses of Christian thought. Yet these dogmas had helped to shelter Christian piety and preserve the Christian life; and a day would come when they would be needed no more, and the churches would unite more closely in the great quest for the Kingdom of God.

On Sunday evening Mr. Carpenter concluded the course of four lectures on "The Gospels, and How to Read Them," which he has given in the smaller assembly room of the Guildhall, Cambridge, to audiences chiefly of University students. The concluding lecture was on the Fourth Gospel. A strong desire has been expressed by some of those who attended these lectures for Sunday morning services during term at Cambridge, and there seems to be good prospect that in the New Year this will be arranged.

On Tuesday afternoon Mr. Carpenter concluded a similar course of four lectures which he has given through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Humphry Ward at their house in Grosvenor-place.

The last lectures in the courses at Nottingham, Lewisham and Richmond will be given next week.

YORKSHIRE UNION BAZAAR.

FOR the first time in its long history the Mill Hill congregation has been engaged with a bazaar, not merely as subscribers or purchasers—that, of course, has been a common experience with us all—but as an interested party, undertaking the larger part of all the organising and arrangements required for successfully carrying it through. We have tried our best to divide the labour and the honours, and could regret that we have not been more successful; but inevitably the chief share of the work falls to those upon the spot, and where honour implies the expenditure of both time and money men are apt to shirk it, and those who would readily give the money often can ill spare the time.

So, in spite of many efforts to obtain from other parts of the county and country both openers and chairmen, Leeds was compelled to take for itself the larger share of the prominent offices. The exceptions were very welcome to us all, and the Rev. C. J. Street had a hearty reception when on the last day he took the chair as representative of the ancient and important congregation of Upper Chapel. But special acknowledgments were due and duly expressed to the president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who left his business in London to give up practically two days to our service.

But if I were to begin making acknowledgments, I am afraid, Mr. Editor, you would have either to cut down unmercifully what I had written, or else to give up many columns to merely local news. The bazaar has been as great a pecuniary success as I for one ever anticipated it could be. We have not reached the sum we set out to raise. I never thought we should, and others who know nearly as much of the prospects as I do formed much more gloomy anticipations. A letter lies before me now, written (before the terms of the circular appealing to our public were yet decided) by one who has been for many years a faithful and diligent worker for the Union. He is a business man, and not given as many of us are to alternate fits of despondency and enthusiasm, or at all swayed by sentimental considerations. "I think," he writes, "we ought to stop 'crying for the moon,' in which category I place the talk about supporting a minister at large, and also raising £5,000 by a bazaar. We should regard it as a bazaar for the assistance of our most needy congregations, and should aim at £1,000." At the time this letter was written the opinion was a sensible if not a hopeful one. The change in the situation was entirely due to the interference, which we sometimes deprecate, more often I hope gratefully welcome—of the women—of one woman especially, who took up the idea of a bazaar with characteristic energy and spirit, and speedily fired others with her own enthusiasm. The situation was at once changed. The draft appeal which we poor-hearted men had drawn up was remodelled: a new tone of resolve and hopefulness was imparted to it, and the movement was started which culminated on Saturday evening in our reaching very near to the goal we had set before us.

To have made £4,000 net, or very near it, is a good reward for our work. But to me it seems the lesser part of the gain which the bazaar has brought to us. Our real triumph is for once, and the first time in our history to have united all the churches of the Yorkshire Union in a common work, and work not of three days but of many months. In my last "Provincial Letter" I spoke of Wakefield, York, and Scarborough, as not being represented in the bazaar. York, alas! is not in the Union, has not belonged to us these many years. But of the other churches, though not officially represented as we could have desired, they all sent contributions, and subscribers and purchasers from them were present and not on one day only. There is not one of our twenty-three churches which has not one way or another helped do the work, and so made an acknowledgment that the cause was theirs, and that they too, though perhaps too far away to take an active share in it, were interested in its success and in their measure responsible.

This is a great gain, and if we must count upon its being but temporary, and if the interest newly awakened is sure to fall off, yet is it much that it has for once been awakened. It was worth all the labour and expense of the bazaar to have attained so much.

Another happy feature of these three days' work has been the amount of support we have had from outside our own denomination. Some came of good will. Unitarians had always been so willing to help them, they said, that they could not refuse help in return. Others wanted to see the decorations, which were of a kind new at least to Leeds. Brown paper of a fine texture was the ground work, and along the top ran a decorative frieze in red. In the centre of the hall was a market clock tower, and on the platform a rustic cottage of admirable design in which the Lady Mayoress (Mrs. A. C. Briggs) carried on an active business in the sale of flowers, fruit, bulbs, and plants. Altogether the scene was most pleasing, and on Saturday night the large hall was inconveniently crowded. Entertainments of really excellent character and a café chantant helped to induce some people to spend longer hours and probably spend more at the bazaar than they had ever intended. It is over now, but I think for long years to come Yorkshire Unitarians will talk of this our county bazaar, just as still our older Leeds peo le talk of the bazaar held fifty years ago in the new infirmary. That was a grand affair, but for the small constituency to which we can appeal this too has been "grand," though conscious how numerically insignificant a body we are we purposely refrained from using the word in our advertisements.

If we succeed as well in the difficult task which now lies before us of spending well the money we have so well collected, the bazaar will indeed mark the beginning of a new era of Unitarianism in Yorkshire.

OBITUARY.

SIR JOHN R. ROBINSON.

AFTER only a few days' illness from heart-failure Sir John Robinson passed away on Monday night, at his residence, Addison-crescent, Kensington, being 75 years of age. His departure means to THE INQUIRER the loss of an old and faithful friend, for his connection with our paper in the early years of his distinguished career as a journalist in London is one of the memories, linked with the names of John Lalor, Richard Hutton, and J. L. Sanford, which it is a happiness and an honour to cherish.

In our two Jubilee numbers, in July, 1892, and again in 1902, Sir John Robinson wrote with warm friendship and generous appreciation of THE INQUIRER, his "first love," and told how in 1847 he came up to London, "introduced by my kind friend and adviser, the Rev. Henry Solly," to sub-edit THE INQUIRER, then the property of the late Richard Kinder, after the retirement of the first editor, the Rev. William Hincks. Mr. Robinson was then just 19. Born in 1828, at Witham, Essex, a son of the Rev. Richard Robinson, a Congregational minister, he was sent to the Lewisham (now Caterham) School, and very early entered on his journalistic career as reporter to a Bedford paper. When after a varied experience in the provinces he came to London, it was not only to THE INQUIRER, but as sub-editor of Douglas Jerrold's "Weekly Newspaper." This brought him into touch with the Daily News, while he wrote with great diligence for other papers on both sides of the Atlantic, and his official connection with that journal began in 1854, first as editor of the Express, an evening paper established by the proprietors. When in 1868 he was appointed manager of the Daily News, he gave up his other journalistic connections to devote his whole strength to what was, in fact, his life work. In those days he knew Dickens and Thackeray, and Harriet Martineau was his warm friend. He was brought into personal contact with Kossuth and Mazzini. and his inborn liberalism was quickened to new fervour.

His management of the Daily News was a brilliant success. He secured Archibald Forbes as war correspondent during the Franco-Prussian War, and raised a Daily News Fund of £20,000 for the relief of distress in France. His generous sympathies found many other outlets, and when he retired in 1901, one of the most valued testimonies to the high esteem in which he was held was an address from the people of the Balkans. From 1887 to 1896 he was editor, though the work of night-editor was in the hands of the late P. W. Clayden.

It was in 1893 that Sir John Robinson received the honour of knighthood.

Our friend's direct connection with THE INQUIRER ceased soon after the lamented death of Mr. Lalor, though for a short time he was joint-proprietor of the paper, when, in 1863, he joined with the Rev. T. L. Marshall and the late E. T. Witfield in purchasing it from Mr. Kinder. His first association, when he became sub-editor, was with Dr. Sadler, of Hampstead, who was then writing most of the leading articles. Of Mr. Lalor, who became editor in 1849, he always spoke with devoted admiration.

Since 1867 Sir John had been one of the Dr. Williams' Trustees, and was the oldest surviving member of the Board, with the exception of Mr. T. Smith Osler, who was appointed in the previous year. Quite recently he attended a meeting of the Board, and took an active part in the business.

Sir John married in 1859 a daughter of Mr. W. Granger, of Wickham Bishops. She died many years ago, but a son and daughter remain; and Sir John's nephews, Mr. Richard Robinson, of Manchester, formerly of Liverpool, and his brothers, are well known in the circle of our churches.

Wednesday's Daily News, in addition to a full biography, had a brief leader, with the following words of warm tribute:—"For nearly forty years Sir John was associated with this journal as manager, and for a considerable period as editor also. More than any man living he embodied the traditions and aspirations of the Daily News, and he entertained for it to the last a personal affection that had something paternal and touching in it. Sir John Robinson was a sincere Liberal and a great journalist—great in his instinct for news, but great chiefly in his devotion to those high ideals of honour, veracity, and faithfulness to principle without which journalism is an unworthy and even pernicious calling. Few men have won finer journalistic laurels than the gentle, gracious old man whom we mourn to-day, but the greatest of all his many titles to praise and lasting remembrance is that he won them without the surrender of a single principle that he valued or one departure from the high path of duty that he pursued."

It was Sir John Robinson's wish to be cremated. The funeral service is to be held this (Saturday) morning, at Essex Church, Kensington, at half-past ten.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

1 CORINTHIANS XIII.

"Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up."

"LOVE suffereth long, and is kind." There is no love so long-suffering as God's love. Think how He lets us all muddle along, going wrong, getting into trouble, danger, and mistakes, when He knows all about it, that we may learn by our own experience. Must it not need infinite patience and long-suffering to see us going wrong, and yet wait for us to find things out for ourselves? And in all the wonderful things that men learn and discover about the stars, the desert lands, the Arctic regions, about electricity, and all the natural laws, God does not tell us all about them at once, but leaves us to take pains and trouble, and undergo hardships, and make mistakes, that we may gradually learn what is known to Him all the time.

And a good teacher follows the same plan; see the patience with which he will explain the lessons over and over again to a child, waiting till he learns his lesson, correcting his mistakes, showing him the reasons, chiding his idleness, and helping him to work steadily on till he makes the lesson his own. Many children try their teachers greatly, and have no idea how much "long-suffering" is needed.

And think of the patience of your mothers; how they tend you, as tiny babies, and lose sleep and rest in untiring care of you helpless little creatures who would die if you were neglected; how they lead the little toddling things up from babyhood till they are real little boys and girls; how they teach them gradually, as they are able to learn; and then as they grow older, they let them go about more alone, and find out things for themselves. Then the mothers know that the children must sometimes get into trouble or accidents, and in that way they learn much more quickly than if they were only told what is good and safe for them and what is harmful. Mother would gladly save you from every accident, and when you get into any trouble it pains her more than it does you, but she "suffereth long" that you may learn and understand. And when you are naughty and she has to punish you, and you refuse to be sorry, she "suffereth long, and is kind," till her child returns from his wandering.

And remember how God "suffereth long" with us all when we do wrong! How we must grieve Him with our sins. We harden our hearts, and shut our ears so that we do not hear Him speak to us; and when, at last, we come back to our Father, like the prodigal son in the parable, because we cannot live without Him, He takes us back again, to try us again.

Peter once came and asked Jesus, "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus said to him, I say not unto you, Until seven times; but, Until seventy times seven." That story is in Matthew xviii. 21; and if you read on in the same chapter, you will find the story which Jesus tells to explain his saying. There should be no end or limit to our long-suffering and kindness; and if we have in our hearts the great Love which Paul speaks of, and if we are free from selfishness, this long-suffering kindness will come easily to us.

"Love envieth not." No, indeed! Envy is a most hateful and selfish sin. Can we imagine a worse feeling than to envy another the success or happiness which we should so much like to have ourselves? Just in as far as anyone can feel envy, he is without love; and can anything really be worse than that? It is so plain, that I need not say more about it. You all know stories of envy, which brings "hatred and malice and all uncharitableness," but we can none of us be too careful in crushing out every smallest beginning of envy; as, when it once takes root, it grows like the rankest of weeds. Never envy your schoolfellows or friends any success or good fortune, but always be ready to rejoice with them that rejoice.

"Love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up." That means that it does not boast, and is not conceited. If anyone does well, and then boasts of what he has done, he spoils all the goodness of the deed. If a boy is clever, and boasts that he can do things that his companions cannot do, no one respects him. He could not "vaunt himself" or be "puffed up" about anything that he could do, or be, if he had Paul's "love" in his heart; for that is a love of all that is great and good, and such vanity is a mean and base feeling. Such a love would show him that there were vast regions of beauty and nobleness and wisdom that he had never reached, and could only hope to draw nearer to by earnest effort and patience. It would give him an ideal towards which to work. As Paul says in another place, "forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal," like the runner running a race, with the goal in view which he has to reach. The people who do really great deeds are not the ones to boast.

There was a man who undertook to go out in an awful sea in his little boat to a wrecked ship. He said coolly, "Who's coming?" and his two sons stepped forward. Just as they were launching the boat, a horse, frightened at the raging sea, ran off with a cart, and knocked a hole in the little boat; but as there was no other boat, the man took off his jacket, rolled it up and laid it over the hole, and said to one of the men, "Sit against that." The man took his seat at once, and they faced that sea with its awful waves, and reached the ship. Amongst the crowd who watched them go was a woman with clasped hands, whose face was very white, and had a wonderful look upon it. She did not speak nor make any sound. It was her husband and sons that were in the boat. Presently the boat came back, plunging over the waves. They were baling hard to keep it afloat, as the leak was very bad, and the boat was heavy now, for the shipwrecked crew were all in it.

The fisherman and his sons quietly pulled the poor little boat up; they thought nothing of what they had done, and never dreamed of boasting. They had thought only of the lives to be saved, and risked their own without a moment's doubt.

RECONCILIATION.

"A DISCOURSE read at one of the meetings of the National Triennial Conference in Liverpool, April, 1903, is here reprinted, with some slight additions and corrections. It was further entitled, "A Study of Human Experience in the Life of the Spirit." These words, though omitted now from the title page, may yet serve to suggest both the intent and the limitations of so brief an utterance on so large a theme.

"The personal note which prevails in one part of the discourse might well, perhaps, have been changed or subdued for the printed page. It is retained, if with some reluctance, in the hope that the experience there disclosed may avail, however slightly, in the service of others to whom a like inward struggle is appointed. Possibly, by lessening for such the painfulness of a spiritual conflict, there may be granted to one who ventures thus to speak, some lowly part in that vicarious suffering, through which, in the fellowship of thought and love, we aid each other and realise together the sacred brotherhood of souls that search for truth and find it after many days."

Such is the Prefatory Note to the address on "The Forgiveness of Sins and the Law of Reconciliation," by the Rev. W. J. JUPP, as separately published in booklet form.* Many of our readers will remember the deep impression made by that address as the closing utterance of the Liverpool Conference last April; others will remember it as it appeared in these columns and in the reprint of the Proceedings of the Conference. They will be reminded by this prefatory note of what all should know, that here is a personal testimony of rare simplicity and earnestness, beautiful in the manner of its utterance, telling of one who "emerged from a great spiritual darkness into the light of reconciliation and great peace." The story of emancipation from the dread of a wrathful God, the terror of impending fate over the great mass of sinful men, is here told once more, and so as to open the way to universal hope, not by the partial remedy of any doctrine of vicarious suffering and atonement, but through a larger vision of the ideal good. The religion of mediatorial grace was indeed a step in advance from the religion of fear, but the more perfect joy was yet to come in the conviction that love is always and everywhere supreme, that there is no "offended" Deity, and that the sense of sin is but the shadow cast by the soul already aspiring to a higher good.

In one exquisite passage, Mr. JUPP tells of the burdened youth, whose experience he records, how one evening walking alone over a wide grassy common, there came to him, he knew not why or whence, a new thought of the overruling Power of the universe as Love.

"Across the wide green earth on which he trod and filling all the space above, far into the softening splendours of that light-filled sky, the presence of a silent brooding love seemed making itself known to him. A strange sweet spirit of kindness and goodwill compassed him about; a tenderness touched him like that which had looked forth in other years from his mother's face and trembled in her voice when it addressed him—like that, but infinitely greater, stronger, more intense." Such Love, known to the human heart, must indeed overcome evil with good, and give a true insight into life's discipline. Thus, in a later passage, Mr. JUPP speaks of its bearing upon the facts of human sin and aspiration:—

"The Divine Heart must always love; and however it afflict, or punish, if we must still think of suffering born of wrong as punishment, the grace of its magnanimity can never change or be withdrawn from the weakest and the worst. Greatness that is also goodness must needs be merciful, and its relation to the finite and the frail is always compassionate, redemptive, strong and tender, bountiful and kind.

* * * * *

"Yet this should in no wise hint of leniency, or any solemn trifling with evil. The great stern laws of right know no relaxing. Justice, however tempered with mercy, remains justice still. The cleansing fires that burn out sin burn with a steady flame, and no drop of water is allowed, or should be prayed for, to subdue their heat. Only, they are the fires of purgatory, not of hell; an awful and unswerving love glows in them; the purpose of their pain is deliverance, and every sufferer may endure cheered and comforted with hope."

We have quoted this passage in order to call special attention to it, as to some extent a corrective to other passages in the address, at which we confess to have stumbled, because they appeared to us to pass over somewhat too lightly the stress of the moral conflict in man. We are completely at one with Mr. JUPP in what we take to be his main plea, and grateful to him for so clear an exposition of the truth, that the attitude of moral endeavour should always be with the forward look, with perfect confidence in the Supreme Goodness, and that victory over sin will come not through brooding over past unfaithfulness, but through a more strenuous and joyful obedience to the true ideal. Yet it appears to us that the conviction of sin, brought home to a man's own conscience, is not fully described simply as short-coming and failure to live up to the ideal; too often there is wilful sin against the light, rebellion against what is known to be the nobler course at the bidding of mean or cruel self-indulgent passion. Then when a man awakes, to see what he has become and what he has done, there is a terror of alienation from the purity of the Divine Law, a remorse and hatred of himself, from which he ought not to shrink. When Mr. JUPP says in his narrative that the sense of sin was to the young man his consciousness of failure, yet at the same time his inward response to the attraction of the Ideal; and that "the gloom of remorse, as of some awful guilt, lying darkly on the soul, was seen now as the shadow cast by the pure light of holiness falling on his poor, imperfect deeds," we can well believe that to be the record of a veritable experience; but where deeds have not been simply poor and imperfect, but there has been wilful, infamous, and cruel wrong, there surely it is inevitable that the soul should pass through an agony of remorse.

Even when the man is lifted up into whole-hearted love of the ideal good and gives himself to loyal service of the Highest, by whatever means the new quickening has come to him, he cannot forget the stain of guilt upon his life, or efface the bitter memories of the wrong he has done. He cries to the living GOD to be forgiven, not that he may escape from that remorse which must remain as a cleansing fire in his soul, still less from the suffering which is the stern yet most merciful discipline of life, but that he may be once more at peace in his submission to the Divine Will and his acknowledgment of the Supreme Good.

The pardon we need is not that, indeed, to be wrung from an offended Deity, but that simply of a child received again into his father's arms of love. In wilful disobedience we must feel alienated from that love, and the depth of guilt must be the measure of the utter misery of the soul so estranged; but when the will and the whole desire of the heart are bent once more on doing what is right, with the passionate longing so far as possible to make good the wrong that has been done, then surely it is natural and right to ask to be forgiven, to be received back once more into harmony with the Divine purpose of life, and the wonderful peace and the renewal of joy in the soul brought back to its true allegiance are the Father's token of welcome to His child.

This is the reconciliation of which Mr. JUPP so beautifully speaks, but in the history of the soul awakened to a sense of guilt, and brought back through bitter penitence to true life, it seems to us that the distinct thought of pardon or forgiveness, asked and received in a supreme confession of the soul, must also have a place.

A GREAT IDEAL.

A HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH OF GOD.

BY THE REV. J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

I AM to speak to you during the short time at my disposal this afternoon on the subject of the strengthening of our congregational life. It is an old subject. Like the poor, it is ever with us—this problem, how to make our churches centres of greater vitality, how to retain and effectively utilise the energy we possess, and which is so apt to leak away, leaving behind only a memory and a tradition.

It may seem perhaps a little incongruous that I who am only at the beginning of my ministerial work should be addressing you on the subject, so many of you being older and of large experience in all church problems. And yet I think many of us younger ministers are beginning to look at some of these problems in a new way, and to feel that there are new methods to which we are slowly advancing in dealing with them. And it is on the understanding that you are ready to accord a value to the dreams of youth, as well as to the mature experience of age, that I venture to take up the theme.

Why this constant Attrition?

Often enough we have it asked, why it is that, with so many modern tendencies setting our way, the influx of fresh life into our churches from the outside is comparatively so small. There is another question which interests me even more. Why is it that so often we fail to keep our own? Have you ever considered this fact—that if we had only retained all who during the last thirty or forty years have been born and reared within our fold, our churches would now be filled to overflowing? We in England have been apt to give very inadequate reasons for this constant attrition from which we suffer, often laying all to the charge of fashion and the social attractions which the dominant State Church here possesses. The inadequacy of such reasons is seen from the fact that our Unitarian churches across the broad Atlantic in New England suffer in a similar way. Even in those favoured spots, and there are many there, where tradition and fashion are all in our favour, the result is precisely similar. I have gone very carefully into the recent statistics of our New England churches, and have come to the conclusion that even there during the last thirty years the visible body of our Church has made but a feeble growth, however much its spirit may have gone abroad. Of course, we are constantly being told never to mind statistics, and the counting of heads is even cried down as a procedure worthy only of grovelling, faith-lacking minds. Personally, I feel that much good may come of a little more ecclesiastical arithmetic. And as this is only a matter of the rule of simple addition, it at any rate cannot lead us into any very grievous error.

Then here is another pointthat appeals to me. We often make great claims, e.g., that our faith is in tune with modern science, and modern thought, as none others; that it is in line with modern research and scholarship as regards the Bible, as regards the world religions; that it is founded on an adequate and rational theology. Now if all this be so, where are our great scientists, our great modern thinkers and writers, our great Biblical scholars, our great philosophers of to-day? Certainly they are not within our fold, they are not taking their stand as champions or sustainers of our efforts. Yet I venture to think that in a vast number of cases the attitude to the universe taken up by the real influential thinkers of to-day is identical with our own. And all we can say is this—that our movement, as such, is somehow without attraction, an attraction we feel it ought to possess.

Now let us try to get at a more adequate cause of these phenomena I have referred to. Here is the way I, for one, look at it.

Need of a great Idea.

Comte in his "Philosophie Positive" wrote, "Ideas govern the world." He went so far as to imply that his readers, being thoughtful men, would scarcely need reminding of that fact. Great ideas have ever been the cementing and inspiring forces in every great movement, social, religious, political, in human history. But what do we mean by a "great idea"? Not, in this connection at least, something abstract and visionary. We mean a possibility on which the mind seizes, and which it discerns may be made actual and concrete. It is a possibility which becomes a power because it kindles the imagination, lays hold of dormant energies, and demands expression, incorporation in actual life. Just now we are hearing much about "the Empire." That is a great idea, and when you mention it, you touch at once the springs of human action. A tariff theory by itself is a fairly dry and abstract affair, but link it to the idea of an Empire, and passion and will are stirred to their depths. When the British colonies in America a hundred and thirty years ago began their struggle with the Mother Country, the quarrel was about certain principles of taxation. Presently, a great idea flashed into the hearts and minds of the colonists, the idea of an independent Republic. By its advent a nation was born, and its right to live was speedily justified.

The Holy Catholic Church.

To come nearer to my point. Christianity first flourished in a number of more or less independent and isolated religious communities. How long it could thus have gone on flourishing we may speculate if we please. But Christianity also gave birth to a great idea, which settled for ever the question of its permanence as a distinct movement. That was the idea of the Holy Catholic Church. Here was something that appealed to the devotion, the fidelity, the aspiration of men. We may criticise the forms that idea assumed, and the claims and assumptions made on its behalf. But the fact remains that more than for any worldly ambition or personal desire, men lived and struggled and died for the realising on earth of that idea of an all-embracing, all-authoritative Church of Christ.

The Reformation dealt this a certain disaster. But where the reaction has been strongest and most permanent—I mean in England—the Catholic idea was simply superseded by another, that of a State Church. This is indeed the real secret of the hold this Episcopalian institution has ever had on the English mind. Men have been gripped together in loyalty to it through the centuries, men remain within its borders to-day when theologically they are outside, through the power of this bond—which is not a prayer-book, nor a creed, nor an ecclesiastical theory or combination of theories, but which is the idea of a State Church itself. This has ever set before them a real, concrete, definite end, and it is an end great enough to inspire their devotion, to inflame them with a persistent, quenchless zeal. Yes, it is an end great enough to keep men true to its service in spite of theological differences, which to us on the outside appear vital.

What have we to offer?

Now put yourself in place of a man who is breaking away from this service, who has been caught by the tide of rational liberal thought, and has been swept from these old moorings. He drifts along in the flood, and perchance comes near to our settlement, and begins to hear the call and the promise we are continually sending out to guide once more to a secure anchorage. He lands, perhaps, and takes stock of our little colony. What does he find? He has left, remember, a great enterprise. He has been reared where men have been busy, not with vague dreams and distant prospects, but with an immediate reality that has absorbed their life. He has been watching, perhaps helping in, the building of a mighty structure, in which for centuries the hopes of men have centred. He has read how the foundations were laid, how the walls began to rise, and has seen the endeavour still going forward, men planning and measuring and laying stone on stone and rearing the vast fabric of a Church of God. He comes to us and looks at the enterprise we have in hand. We tell him of our principles, of new and rational forms of theology, and speak of liberty and liberalism in religion, and their value. But he needs something more than these. He looks inevitably at the immediate end we are striving to attain, to the actual concrete result for which we are working, that shall embody these principles and this liberal theology. And he begins to lack, and he sees that we lack, the inspiring force of a great idea. We are building up, or trying to, individual congregations, specialised movements, and our strength goes into the individual enterprise, merely as individual, and we have not yet risen to a thought of a Church of God which shall lift these up out of their isolation and give them their setting as parts of a mightier structure.

New Clearness of Conception.

Now, as I see it, in so far as this is true, here is the explanation of three-fourths of our weakness. Here is the explanation of the fact that many drift back from our free position into the haven of our historic State Church. It is not fashion entirely, nor theological difference. It is a greater idea that captivates, and the visible and real end in which that idea is being expressed.

Now there is another side to this, and

* A paper read at the Autumnal Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Manchester, on Wednesday, November 11.

it is the side I love best to look upon, and to which I turn in any pessimistic mood. In America, perhaps more than in England, there are the indubitable signs that a larger and more wonderful meaning is being read into our liberal movement, a meaning that is quickening energy and fanning the flame of enthusiasm, a meaning outshining the dreams of our forefathers as the rising sun makes pale the light of the lesser luminary. It was one of our American brethren who, at the first meeting of the International Council, declared: "We as liberals need to give up once for all the idea that we are standing for 'the dissidence of Dissent' and to take our place manfully as leaders in that Catholicism, vaster in its sweep and more practical than that which Hildebrand ever dreamt of. The great word of the ancient creed given to us liberals, and given to us because we are liberals, is, 'We believe in the Holy Catholic Church.'"

An Inspiring Thought.

You may count such words as the expression of mere meaningless sentiment if you please. Knowing as I do the way men have responded to similar calls across in our sister land, the growing hold on their hearts that sentiment daily gains, I see here the first pulsations of a great idea, struggling to come into consciousness, and bringing with it a fresh aspiration, and a vitality that nothing shall quench. I see here the first signs that we are becoming conscious of an end to be achieved commensurate with the greatness of the ultimate principles for which we are standing—an end beyond the individual church—beyond the national denominational interest—an end which can only be described as the building of a Holy Catholic Church of God. I mean this in the most literal and concrete sense. To our Unitarian forefathers it was enough that they were Unitarians. To-day by our very Unitarianism we are set in relation to a great number of religious movements in other lands of similar character to our own. We can no longer think of ourselves as a sect. We but represent here in England that wave of rational thought and liberal religion which is slowly rising in all lands, England, America, Holland, Switzerland, France, Germany, Hungary, and which is to sweep away the outworn dogmas and irrationalities of orthodox Christendom. So our outlook is expanding, the horizon of our interest is being thrown further and further back; our isolation is broken through, and we begin to feel that we are in a deep sense members of a great Church of God. And though we are still struggling on with scattered ranks and adopting guerilla tactics, it has at least become rational to dream of a time when we shall be linked more closely together, and move forward like a mighty army.

Its Practical Bearing.

But this is all very distant, at any rate, it may be urged, and there is nothing here that can exercise any immediate influence on our churches, or help to solve any of their practical problems. If I thought thus I should not be speaking to you here this afternoon. Admitted that the unifying of all these scattered forces is going to be a long and difficult process, has not that process already begun? Is not the movemental already in the direction of greater cohesion? And is not a power and an inspiration trying to enter our hearts, which no mere local interest could ever give, but which springs from the thrill of this great idea, this vision of a vaster possibility which rises before us and delivers us its challenge?

Now in so far as we have felt that inspiration, we have found, I am convinced, the secret of a larger growth. We have come in touch with the power which is going to be the future attracting and cementing force in all our scattered communities, which will offset those other attractive forces against which we are now struggling with such indifferent success: which will stop the slow attrition from which we suffer, which will bring new life into our borders, which will kindle a higher enthusiasm in the pulpit and in the pew, and nerve us to labour and sacrifice, as no other power can.

The Standard of our Building.

In proportion as we feel the inspiration from this source, I believe the methods by which we work will be vitally affected. I should like to say a good deal on this head, but I have already drawn largely on my twenty minutes, and can barely touch it. But it is obvious that the requirements in building a small lecture-room are very different from those necessary to build a mighty cathedral. As we rise to the fact that we are in for the erection of the cathedral, the House of the Lord to which all nations shall flow, we shall necessarily adopt new architectural methods. Judging from American developments, I think that one of the changes here will show itself in a growing distrust of all loose associations, and a growing sense of the importance of a real and living church membership. We shall take the children in our homes and train them for that. We shall bridge the great gulf that lies between the church and the Sunday-school. Our idea of the Sunday-school will change. It will be more and more regarded as the preparatory ground for church members, and we shall hold that it fulfils its function only as its scholars, with maturing years, pass on naturally and inevitably to the larger life and increased responsibility of the church. We shall probably see in the joining of the church a much more solemn and serious procedure than we count it now, and shall mark this by the institution of some simple form to correspond to the confirmation service in the Church of England. Whether this be so or not, I feel assured that we shall strive to give a reality and meaning and a dignity to church membership which it does not now possess.

The Wider Outlook.

But, methods apart, have we not in this connection an immediate task—to begin to foster and nourish that larger idea of our church and its meaning in the world? We ministers are grasping it. We must transmit it, and its inspiration, to our congregations. We must awaken their interest in this vaster outlook, supplement their local patriotism by this more cosmopolitan spirit. It is not a large percentage that possesses a denominational interest in addition to the local. And there is much work to do before this international interest rises in our churches to the heights of a living force. That it can become such I am personally assured. I know that, as I gaze into the future and strive to grasp the meaning of that great event to which we are moving, my heart thrills with a deep and solemn joy. The vista of even grander possibilities rises to my view. The strife of creed and party grows silent in my ear. The light of heaven, no more in fitful rays but in one bright flood of radiance, breaks over the earth, dispelling the mists of ancient fear and doubt, the shadows of despair. I catch the strains of nobler anthems than man has yet poured God-ward. I seem to see the fuller meaning of that kingdom of heaven on earth, the sweet reign of light and love for which Christ toiled and prayed. I cannot doubt that the world needs us. There is a need of light in its darkness, of strength in its struggling, of hope in its despondencies, a need of God in its pessimisms and negations and speculations, in this age of growing free thought, which the old orthodoxies are powerless to touch. And to bring these to men will be the priceless privilege of a Liberal Church, which you and I are called to take an humble part in building, with a significance vast enough to attract all who work for the intellectual, moral, and spiritual upbuilding of our race; a church

> Lofty as is the Love of God,
> And ample as the needs of man.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

BAYLISS v. COLERIDGE.

SIR,—Now that, thanks to the admirable full report of this trial given in the British Medical Journal, it is possible to make a careful survey of the whole of the evidence, certain points are seen to emerge which—without, of course, affecting the main issue decided by the jury—are, perhaps, of sufficient public interest to deserve being briefly stated.

(1) The trial, in the words of the Lord Chief Justice, "had nothing whatever in the world to do with whether the question of vivisection was right or wrong." That question remains an open one, unaffected by the verdict given in favour of Dr. Bayliss.

(2) The trial has not settled the question whether there is any cruelty connected with vivisectional experiments as conducted under the existing law; the verdict, based upon the evidence of provivisectionist witnesses, and rejecting that of anti-vivisectionist witnesses, pronounces merely to the effect that a certain dog was really insensible at the time of being experimented on.

(3) The evidence shows that this particular experiment was performed, not, as Mr. Rufus Isaacs said, "in order that human lives might be saved or prolonged," but for the purpose of demonstrating a physiological law known for over thirty years.

(4) While the Act lays down the principle that "no such demonstration to students is to take place unless it is absolutely necessary for their due instruction," and while it is laid down by Sir James Paget that "generally speaking, classes can be taught as well without experiments as with them," this experiment was performed on the sole ground that the physiological law in question would by this means be better impressed on the students' memory and general knowledge. Such an interpretation of the words "absolutely necessary," renders the provision of the Act nugatory, and frustrates the humane intention with which it was framed.

(5) The evidence adduced reveals the hopeless conflict of expert opinion as to whether morphine—the drug in the first place administered to the animal—is or is not a reliable anæsthetic in the case of a dog. Mr. A. J. Sewell, a veterinary surgeon in practice since 1877, called as a witness, denied the reliability of morphine; Claude Bernard, the great vivisector, held that "narcotised with morphine, the animal still remains sensitive; it feels pain, but, so to speak, has lost the idea of self-defence." Where such a doubt exists, one feels that the animal is entitled to the benefit of it.

(6) The public will be usefully reminded by this case that the law since 1892 insists upon complete anæsthesia only during the initial operation of the experiment performed, a provision compatible with acute suffering during the succeeding, and frequently prolonged, stages of the experiment.

(7) Whereas "under the Act, when a dog has been the subject of an experiment, and that experiment is completed, the dog must be destroyed," this animal had been operated upon in December, 1902, kept under observation till February, 1903, and on the experiment being concluded by a second operation, was handed over to another vivisector for another experiment, on the plea that it "was being destroyed all the time." If this is consistent with the letter of the law, it is well that the general public should appreciate the spirit in which the law is interpreted and administered. Does not the fact so brought to light prove the the futility of merely "restricting" the practice of vivisection, and the impossibility of framing restrictive measures which shall prove incapable of being evaded?

Incidentally, a few statements were made on behalf of and by the plaintiff, which fill the mere outsider with wonder.

(1) Mr. Rufus Isaacs seemed to insist that "there was no cutting operation licensed by the Home Secretary, unless it was done under an anæsthetic, so that the animals did not suffer pain." Can it be that Mr. Isaacs has not heard of special certificates being granted, dispensing the vivisector from the use of anæsthetics when, in his opinion, their application would interfere with the success of the experiment?

(2) Mr. Bayliss is reported as saying that "the opening of the pancreas was not a very painful operation under anæsthetics." On the face of it, such a statement is a puzzle: "under anæsthetics"—i.e., in a state of anæsthesia—an operation can, ex hypothesi, not be "painful" at all. The qualified remark that it is "not very painful," seems to hint at the imperfect action of anæsthetics—i.e., at partial sensibility.

(3) Sir Victor Horsley informed the Court that "when he was a student in 1874, physiology was really not properly taught at all." Such a remark, if well founded, ought to lead to the compulsory retirement of all medical men who have the misfortune of having started in practice before the vogue of visisectional demonstrations; but if Sir Victor does not mean to issue such an edict against the "ill-taught" practitioners of more than a generation's experience, perhaps, we shall not take his sweeping statement au grand sérieux.

May I say in conclusion, as one who was present during the whole of Miss Hageby's and Miss Schartau's examination, that nothing could exceed the simplicity, dignity, and clearness with which these young ladies gave their evidence, facing a terrible ordeal with exemplary bravery, and that it is they rather than anyone else who are chiefly entitled to the respectful sympathy of humane men and women.

DOGS FOR VIVISECTION.

SIR,—In your issue of September 19 the heading "Dogs for Vivisection" attracts my attention to a letter you have published. Though it is generally the custom of medical men and "scientists" to ignore such sentimental effusions, yet for the honour of the Unitarian name, which stands for freedom of thought and for earnest truth-seeking, I would that whatever opinions are expressed by our denominational papers they may be in accordance with facts.

If Mr. Gibson has witnessed the "brutalities of a vivisector," or an "agonising death in a vivisectional laboratory," let him report the matter to the proper authorities and he will get ample satisfaction in seeing the "abolition of the loathsome barbarities of vivisection," at least in one case. The burden of proof is with him. The world of science is tired of vague general invectives that have no foundation of fact.

Anti-vivisectionists and most other people of extreme views on one issue are singularly impressed by hearsay and as singularly blind to demonstrations of fact or to arguments of reason. Mr. Gibson will find it as difficult to prove that physiologists and pathologists are brutal and bereft of all humane feelings, as to prove the necessary futility of all experimental work on the lower animals.

The plain and well-worded rebuke administered by the Home Secretary to the deputation which came before him to protest against the increase of vivisection is read with satisfaction by all who can take an unprejudiced view of the aims and methods of scientific progress. Mr. Akers-Douglas's reply is a model of reasonable support of scientific freedom, and shows not only a broader mind but a better acquaintance with facts, which seem to have escaped the notice of those who waited upon him.

MORE LIGHT WANTED.

SIR,—Miss Marian Pritchard, in the course of her speech at Manchester, is reported to have protested against any "hedging" with the Trinitarian doctrine on the ground that God manifests Himself in three forms, "whereas they knew that He manifested Himself in millions of forms." May I ask, like another of your correspondents, for more light? Does Miss Pritchard mean that God manifests Himself equally in all forms, or that we should disregard all manifestations as mere appearances and seek the reality?

If she takes up the former position, may I point out that though God does manifest Himself, e.g., in stone or wood or fire, yet He does not do so to stone or wood or fire, but only to self-conscious rational spirit. Therefore, the manifestation of God in spiritual natures will be of a higher order than that in His material creation. On the other hand, if we are to ignore all manifestations as only appearances, how are we to apprehend the reality? This is the crux which Mr. Hopps appears to have faced, and thereby startled some of his hearers.

I venture to say that there are three aspects under which spirit is apprehended by spirit, and it is difficult to conceive any more. There is God as He is manifested as the principle of life in all creation, the Jehovah, or Jupiter, or Zeus of the ancients, and the Father of Jesus. There is God as He reveals Himself in the souls of men, the infinite background of our being, the sense of a holiness we have not reached, the Holy Spirit that is ever pleading with us, "Be ye perfect as I am perfect." And if this be true, then the necessities of thought require a third aspect. For if it be possible for the human spirit by obedience to the divine will to become perfect and one with the Father, then so far as the limitations of the flesh permit it will manifest divinity, and thus objectively become a quickening revelation to those who have not yet found the law of life, or are treading the way. That is the Son of God born into the Father's likeness. It is not necessary for me to show how this law was long ago fulfilled by one. Every Unitarian meeting testifies to the power of Jesus, for the problem his life presents cannot be avoided.

God the Son, is God realising Himself in humanity so that His kingdom may come on earth. If we deny that possibility, not only do we deprive ourselves of part of the heavenly vision, but we deny God's infinity and make vain His appeal to our individual souls. Are we not too apt to look within and not without, to regard God as speaking to us and not to our brethren, and to confine the kingdom of heaven to our own souls? Thus we become individualistic, opinionated, introspective, and incapable of social effort.

We say that the word Unitarian stands for freedom, but it won't carry the implication, as Dr. Martineau pointed out. Surely that is a strange kind of freedom that offers hospitality to Hindoo and Mohammedan forms of faith and denies it to that form of Christian faith that has swayed the Western world. Would it not be better to discover the underlying truths that constitute its power, and present them in a purified form?

If God be manifested in so many forms, then let us recognise them all in our worship and practical faith. In that Free Catholic Church to which some of us look forward, there will be neither Unitarian nor Trinitarian; at least they will worship side by side, and see the beauties of the other's faith.

UNIVERSITIES AND THE STATE.

SIR,—Mr. Poynting's able and earnest article is a typical example of a too prevalent mode of thought which constitutes, I am more and more convinced, one of the gravest of our national dangers.

His opening remark that "it is hardly necessary, at this time of day, to justify the claim of higher education for State support," is indeed in one sense true, sadly true. In the same sense, Philip II. might have remarked, when sending the Duke of Alva to the Netherlands, "It is hardly necessary, at this time of day, to justify the burning of heretics. Such precedents as the burning of Savonarola at Florence, of Huss at Constance, and, more recently, of Ridley and Latimer in England by my late lamented consort, show that this duty has long been acknowledged by all Christian states. But it has been a reluctant admission, and the duty has been performed without enthusiasm, on too small a scale to be effective. I propose to do the auto da fe business thoroughly, on a scale worthy of the empire on which the sun never sets." The modern demand for more and more State education is milder in form, but identical in principle. Dr. Poynting's heretic is the man who will not willingly give money for a new laboratory. He does not propose to burn him, but only to rob him in due form of law, and with the gentle procedure provided for "Passive Resisters." If Dr. Poynting were to come into my study, revolver in hand, and say to me, "Subscribe to my university fund, or I blow your brains out," he would be only doing directly what he is now trying to do indirectly. If the modern state does not find it necessary to arm its tax-collectors with revolvers, that is only because it is known to have an abundance of such persuasives in reserve.

When your esteemed contributor pleads that the nation would do well to spend more on higher education and research, I am wholly with him; but it cannot be too often repeated that nation and state are not convertible terms. By the State we mean in this country the composite body made up of King, Lords, House of Commons, and Parliamentary electors, which is the organ of the nation for purposes involving coercion. This composite body has, by definition, sufficient might on its side for any purpose to which it can manage to make up its composite mind; but the moral right of the State to take our money, or our lives, can never rise higher than its source, which is the right of every man to use such force as he possesses against a manifest and obstinate wrongdoer. We class governments as good or bad, we obey them cheerfully or reluctantly, according to the degree in which they satisfy these two essential requirements: (1) Efficiency in the employment of force in those few cases where it is the only remedy, and (2) abstinence from the use of force where the necessity is not clearly made out. How a case of clear necessity is to be made out for the forcible extraction of money from the uninterested masses for such a purpose as advanced scientific research, I am at a loss to conceive. The nation, on the other hand, is something vastly greater and nobler than the State. Its chief glory lies in those manifold spontaneous activities (the pursuit of knowledge, for one) of the individuals composing it, with which its force-organ, the State, has, or ought to have, only slight and occasional relations. The measure of a nation's true greatness is the relative insignificance of its officialdom and its politics.

If the apostles of higher education will give up currying favour with the State, and be content to make their appeal to the generosity of the great, free community behind it, they may indeed have a little longer to wait, inasmuch as force is a more summary method than persuasion; but the difference even in that respect cannot be very material, seeing it will take almost as much persuasion to get a Parliamentary majority in their favour as would suffice to extract the same amount of money from the pockets of willing contributors. In any such appeal they will have the hearty sympathy of voluntaryists like your humble servant,

R. K. WILSON.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—Mr. C. F. Pearson, the hon. treasurer, writes from Redington Lodge, Hampstead, N.W.: "Will you allow me space to appeal to our subscribers and friends on behalf of the poor's purse for the winter, which is now close upon us. During the interregnum caused by a change of missionary, a committee of workers and collectors of the Provident Fund are undertaking the general missionary work in looking after the poor who are connected with our mission and chapel. All contributions may be sent direct to me. Having now been treasurer of Carter-lane Mission and then its successor, the Blackfriars Mission, for about thirty years, I take this opportunity of appealing to our Unitarian friends to help us to new names for our general subscription list, which gradually and inevitably declines as our many old friends pass away."

London: Mansford-street, Bethnal Green.—The Rev. John Ellis writes: "Will you kindly allow me to appeal, as in former years, to the generous friends who have helped in the past, and to those whose sympathies may be touched by the present need, for the replenishing of my Poor's Purse, and for funds to provide Christmas dinners and entertainment for poor and distressed. Many of my neighbours in this crowded district are suffering acutely from lack of employment. If work could be found for those who want it, there would be less need for this appeal. Until better times come round I must ask those who are touched with the feeling of brotherhood to help me, in as large measure as possible, to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. Gifts of warm clothing, old and new, especially for men and women, and books and toys for the children, should be addressed to Rev. John Ellis, the Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, London, E."

Acton.—The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed has just concluded a series of Sunday evening lantern lectures on "The Sources of Man's Religious Inspirations," illustrated by some very beautiful slides.

Belfast Domestic Mission. — A week's special mission, has just been conducted at Stanhope-street by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of All Souls' Church. The meetings were very well attended, many strangers being present each evening. The subjects of Mr. Drummond's inspiring addresses were: — "The Invitation of Jesus," "The Teachings of Jesus," "The Prodigal's Return," "Only Believe," "This do and thou shalt live." Special hymns from Mr. Hawkes' collection were sung, and solos rendered by members of the choir. Leaflets, announcing time and subjects were distributed in the surrounding neighbourhood by willing helpers, and the response to the invitation given was very encouraging. All the winter meetings at the Mission are now in full swing, and increased success is attending the work.

Blackpool (South Shore).—On Tuesday, November 24, the New Hall was completely filled when the Rev. V. Mills delivered the last of a course of three lectures on "From a Molecule to a Soul." The lectures have been delivered on three consecutive Tuesdays, and there has been a marked increase in the attendance on each occasion. The title of the first lecture was "The Evolution of the Physical Body;" the second, "The Coming of Mind into the Body." At the close of the first lecture an excellent optical lantern was presented to the Church by Dr. Broadfoot, for the better illustration of these and similar lectures, and a new sheet was also presented by Mr. John Grundy. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer, and a hope was freely expressed that he would again lecture in the Church at an early date. The lectures have been arranged under the auspices of the "North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association."

Blackpool: South Shore.—The opening of the new hall was celebrated on Wednesday, Nov. 25, by a public meeting, preceded by tea, to which about 110 persons sat down. The chair was taken by Mr. J. Wigley, of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and he was supported by the Revs. Principal Gordon, D. Davis, and T. Leyland, and Mr. W. Healey. After an opening hymn and dedicatory prayer offered by the Rev. D. Davis, the chairman urged upon the members of the church to stand united for the common good and prosperity of the church, and the Rev. Alex. Gordon then gave an address, which was heartily appreciated. Other appropriate addresses were delivered by the Revs. T. Leyland and D. Davis, and Mr. W. Healey.

Bury.—In the December number of the Bank-street Chapel Calendar, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers publishes a letter of farewell to the congregation to which he has ministered since 1895. The call of new duty, Mr. Odgers says, takes him away, but he cannot really be separated from old friends, and he leaves with them earnest wishes for their continued well-being as a Christian congregation. In the same Calendar we find the following:—The work of the late Committee of Managers of the Day Schools was practically ended some months back when the committee of the Town Council became responsible for the elementary education of Bury. But before the old committee was finally dissolved it was felt that the members ought not to separate before they expressed in a tangible and permanent form their high appreciation of the devoted services of Mr. Thomas Holt, who has held the important office of secretary of the Day School Committee since their inauguration in 1866. Through all the varied fortunes of the schools he has stuck to his post with assiduous constancy and loving care. On Sunday morning, November 1, the members of the late committee met in the library, and requested Mr. Holt to accept, as a memento of their common work, a silver inkstand and a reading glass, which they hoped he would find useful in the coming years. Mr. Holt accepted the gift in the spirit in which it was offered, and said he trusted that under their new management the schools might recover the prosperity of former days.

Chowbent.—A united meeting of the Chowbent, Leigh, and Swinton Guilds, together with friends from Astley and Bolton, was held at Chowbent on Saturday last. There was a large attendance. Tea was served at 5 o'clock. A most interesting and helpful meeting followed, over which the Rev. J. J. Wright presided, and among the speakers were the Revs. W. E. George and R. S. Redfern, Messrs. Richard Robinson and J. Ridyard. It was unanimously agreed to recommend to the various guilds the formation of a District Guilds' Union. Friends from Hindley and Bolton (Unity) were prevented from being present by parties at their own places. A "Social Hour" brought the very successful gathering at Chowbent to a close.

Cefn Coed: Merthyr Tydfil.—The first of a series of lantern lectures was given at the Old Meeting House an Monday, Nov. 9, by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies to a crowded audience. The handsome lantern lately purchased by the Sunday-school was used for the first time, the subject being "A Day in London." A free library for the scholars has also recently been opened. Nearly 150 books were obtained, part purchased after a collection among the members themselves, and part a kind and much appreciated grant from Dr. Williams' Trust. The number of scholars (now over 150) had been more than doubled during the last six months, and regular worshippers at the morning and evening services are continually being added. A glee party, under the leadership of Mr. J. Lewis, and a string band, conducted by Mr. W. Harris, hold week-night practices, and have already given one public concert.

Dover.—On Monday, November 30, the Rev. James Harwood delivered a most interesting lecture at Adrien-street Church on "India," telling of the visits to this country of Rammohun Roy and Keshub Chunder Sen, and the relations between the Unitarians and the people of India. He also gave a statement of the principles of the Brahmos. A brief meeting was held at the close of the lecture, at which Mr. Harwood urged the claims of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on the Churches. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer.

Gateshead. — On Wednesday evening, November 25, the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, who has recently accepted a six months' engagement as minister of Unity Church, opened the Literary Society with a lecture on "The Life and Work of Henry George," which was greatly appreciated by all present. In the next lecture Mr. Ferguson is to treat of Henry George's social philosophy and his reform of our land system. These lectures are of special interest at the present time, when the taxation of land values is already becoming a burning question as affording the true alternative to any policy that would lay still further burdens on the industrial portion of the community.

Horwich.—A bazaar and sale of work, held on Nov. 26 and 28, has passed off successfully. It was opened on the first day by Mr. John Lawson, J.P., of Highfield, Sharples, Bolton, and on the second day by Alderman Thomas Holt, J.P., of Bury. Messrs. C. J. P. Fuller, F.C.S., of Horwich, and Thomas Harwood, of Bolton, presided respectively. The proceeds, which were to establish a guarantee fund to sustain the finances of the church, included several generous donations, and amounted to £156. This result is extremely satisfactory, in view of the bad state of trade in the town.

London: Islington Theatre Services.—The series of services held at the Grand Theatre during November, concluded last Sunday evening, when the Rev. J. Page Hopps gave a powerful address on "A Future Life; a Rational and Humane View of It." His concluding word was that the key-note of the future life must be Progress, beginning there where one left off here; and Justice, for he maintained that bare justice, let alone love, would empty hell. In the course of the service, Miss Blanche Mackie, of Burnley, sang very beautifully the solo, "Hear, O Israel," from the Elijah, and at the end of the service, when the Rev. E. S. Hicks had given a very cordial invitation to all to Unity Church, the choir of nearly a hundred, under the direction of Mr. G. Callow, gave a fine rendering of the Hallelujah Chorus. It is an encouraging sign to note that each week showed a substantial increase in the numbers attending, which were reckoned as 463, 675, 924, 1,453, on the four Sundays. In connection with the services the district about the theatre was thoroughly canvassed by a few friends, 19,000 circulars being thus distributed. Very satisfactory also was the large number who so willingly came forward to help either in the choir or as stewards. About 150 people helped in the choir, and about 50 as stewards during the series. Mr. E. F. Boult (of Hampstead), who took up the work of organising with great energy, desires to add his personal thanks to those who so kindly came forward and helped at the services, and to whose willing help their success has been so very largely due.

London: Highgate.—Of the bazaar on Wednesday and Thursday we hope to have a report next week.

London: Wandsworth.—On Friday evening, Nov. 27, a meeting of the Social and Literary Union was held to receive a visit from the representatives of the London Layman's Club. Mr. H. B. Lawford, in the regretted absence of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant through illness, presided, and offered a very cordial welcome to Dr. Herbert Smith and the other members of the club who were present. Brief addresses, explanatory of the rules and ideals of the club, were delivered by the President, Dr. Herbert Smith, and by the one clerical member of the club present, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Music and songs were contributed by Messrs. A. Savage Cooper, Walter Odgers, W. F. Wartzburg (vising members of the Club), and by Messrs. Hugh James, Benson Lawford, and W. Pearce. Mr. H. B. Lawford gave a recitation. In spite of most unpropitious weather there was a large attendance, and a most delightful evening was spent. It is to be hoped that representatives of the Layman's Club will make the round of the metropolitan churches.

London: Limehouse.—On Thursday, November 19, a lecture on "India" was given at Durring Hall, with limelight illustrations. On Thursday, November 26, Miss Jennet Humphreys gave a concert, when she and her friends were heartily welcomed, and songs, violin, and pianoforte solos were re-demanded with undoubted good intent. The boys' brass band of the Institution, numbering some 25 players, gave capital proof of their skill in the spacious outer hall at the conclusion of the concert. The Thursday entertainment this week was a cantata, "The Holiday Concert," rendered by the Sunday scholars.

Rotherham.—The opening lecture of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union for the present session was given on Wednesday evening, November 25, by the Rev. E. G. Evans, of Chesterfield, his subject being "Oliver Cromwell." There was an excellent attendance, and Mr. Evans was heartily thanked for his lecture.

South Cheshire and District Association.—On Wednesday, Nov. 18, the Autumnal Meeting was held at Knutsford. Owing to the place of meeting being so far from most of the churches and schools of the Union, there was only a moderate attendance of representatives. Owing to an engagement elsewhere the president, Rev. J. C. Street, was unable to attend, and the chair was taken by the vice-president, Mr. R. Mansell. The proceedings opened with a conference, at which an interesting paper was read by the Rev. G. A. Payne on "Sunday-school Difficulties and How to Surmount Them." After tea a religious service was held in the old chapel, conducted by the Rev. C. D. Badland, who preached from the text, "Leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation." Despite the smallness of numbers the whole proceeding were hearty and encouraging.

Stockton-on-Tees.—A bazaar was held here on November 19 and 20, and was in every way a success. After all expenses were paid, there remained some £85.

Sydney: New South Wales. — We have already announced the amalgamation of the "Australian Church," founded by the Rev. George Walters five years ago, with the Hyde Park Unitarian Church, from which he had seceded. The first reunion services were held on Sunday, October 4, when there was an attendance of about 150 in the morning, and in the evening the building was comfortably filled with over 300, when Mr. Walters took for the subject of his discourse "Why I am still a Unitarian." A reunion concert was held on the 6th, and on Wednesday, the 14th, a social meeting was held in the church, at which addresses were delivered by Mr. William Donald, J.P., Mr. A. T. Munro, Mr. H. C. Bell, and Mr. Walters. It was noted as worthy of satisfaction that more members had returned with Mr. Walters than had left with him five years ago, and altogether a spirit of great hopefulness was exhibited. Apart from the work of the church, Mr. Walters is president of the Shakespeare Society of N.S.W., and also o the Cremation Society.

Temperance Sunday.—Special sermons on temperance were preached in 38 of our churches last Sunday.

Whitby.—The Rev. F. H. Williams writes to say that a friend enables him to offer a second fifty copies of his "Bible for the Practical Man" free to Sunday-school teachers for the price of postage—4d. per copy.

Wolverhampton.—On Sunday, Nov. 22, the preacher at both services in All Souls' Church was Dr. Darby, secretary of the Peace Society, who had been specially invited to come and preach peace sermons. His addresses were much appreciated by fair congregations, quite a number of strangers from other churches being present; and after the evening service a short meeting was held, and a vote of thanks to Dr. Darby was proposed by the Rev. J. B. Higham, the resident minister (who had conducted the services), seconded and supported by two Congregationalists, a Quaker, and Mr. H. E. Perry, chairman of the Church Committee, and unanimously carried. Dr. Darby expressed his pleasure at having been able to come and give some assistance to minister and congregation by setting forth the wrongfulness of war as a method of settling international disputes, and advocating the more Christian and sensible way of arbitration.

THE LIVERPOOL POST says:—"Mr. Armstrong has published various books that reveal him as the profound thinker and enlightened theologian. But nothing from his pen is comparable in the bestowal of unalloyed delight, to this little book, which reveals him as the lover and kindly instructor of young people. In his 'talks,' he guides them towards paths of thought for the traversing of which it is well they should be prepared; and often in such a manner that they are at the very heart of some literary or historical masterpiece, and are learning its soul-lesson before they realise that they are not reading or listening to some mere interesting fairy tale."

VERSION PREPARED BY M. PRITCHARD.
With Introduction and Notes.

(Cloth, 8vo., red edges, price 3s. 6d.)

In this book an attempt has been made to get nearer to the meaning of the original by omitting some passages now held by many students to be interpolations, and also by first comparing several translations in order to select that word or phrase which seemed to convey the truest sense. It is hoped that by this means the great beauty, and wonderful teaching of this ancient masterpiece may be brought more clearly before the notice of the general reader.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE INQUIRER of Dec. 26 will be our Christmas Number, and also the last of the year. For next week's issue we must reserve the paper by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas on "A Church of the Future." Then also we hope to publish a special article on Unitarianism in the light of the London Religious Census, and the third of Mrs. Bosanquet's articles on Work in the Parish," in the series on Questions on Social Economics.

WE propose to publish next week a calendar for Christmas Day, as well as for Sunday, and shall be glad to have notice in good time of Christmas Day services, which are to be included.

THE Sunday School Association has issued its annual motto card, "In due season we shall reap if we faint not," tastefully illustrated, and with a calendar of Bible readings for each Sunday of the year printed on the back. The Association's admirable classified catalogue of "Books for Young People," 1903-4, is also ready. A good show of Christmas books will be found in the S.S.A. room at Essex Hall, of which an early inspection is invited.

WE trust that friends in London will not overlook the performance of the Moral Masque, "The Sun's Darling," to be given at the Portman Rooms, Baker-street, next Friday evening, in aid of the Kentish Town Free Christian Church. Particulars will be found advertised in another column. This old seventeenth century masque is to be produced under the direction of Mr. Savage Cooper, and those who remember the delightful open-air performance of "Comus" a few years ago, in connection with the London Bazaar, will feel confident that this other revival also will be thoroughly worth seeing.

FRIENDS of the Noel Society, which aims at making a brighter Christmastide for city children, will be welcome at the annual distributions of toys, the first of which is to take place at the Passmore Edwards' Institute, Tavistock-place, W.C., on Monday, Dec. 21, at 4.30 p.m. The toys will be on view from 3.30, and Mrs. Humphry Ward, President of the Society, will take part in the proceedings. Particulars as to other distributions may be had from the hon. sec., Miss K. M. Robinson, 37, Adair House, Chelsea, S.W.

OF Herbert Spencer, who passed away early on Tuesday morning at Brighton, in his eighty-fourth year, Professor Upton writes in another column. He had accomplished a great work, with wonderful persistence in the economy of his strength, in the completion of his system of philosophy, and set a noble example in the steadfast devotion of his life to worthy ends.

ON Monday, Dec. 7th, the last of the series of addresses on the Problem of Poverty was delivered by Mr. John Burns, M.P., L.C.C., to a large audience in the Friends' Meeting House, Bishopsgate. Mr. Burns described and defended the work of the municipalities in dealing with city poverty. Poverty, he said, may be natural in a poor land, but in a great and wealthy city, he regarded it as unnatural, the very sign-manual of social disorder. Under these circumstances it was dangerous and degrading. Much might be done by individual effort, and he commended the example of Mr. Seebohm Rountree and Mr. George Cadbury. But unaided individual effort could never solve the ever-increasing city problem which confronted the municipalities. The business of the municipality was, acting in a neighbourly spirit, to do for the individual who is merged in the mass what he cannot do for himself alone.

MUCH adverse criticism had been passed on our municipalities for extravagance; in forty years they had spent upon the most beneficent productive works a sum about equivalent to that expended in the South African war. Consider the assets of the one as compared with the other! He urged Friends to enter more and more into municipal work; it was perhaps the freest and widest field for that social service which Woolman and Penn had urged upon their forefathers. He reminded his hearers how Whitman described his ideal city as "the new city of Friends." Mr. Burns then alluded to the housing work of the L.C.C., showing that in ten years they had reduced the number of the overcrowded in their district by 105,000—the population of a provincial town. He was wholly opposed to pauperising the poor, but this had been done without a charge on the rates, indeed, with a profit of £8,000. Homes, however, are incomplete without a garden; and to provide the equivalent for this, the Council had increased the London parks from 60 to 106, and had made them in every respect more serviceable to the people. He regarded the £12,000, spent upon music in the parks as the best spent money of all.

HAVING referred to the important temperance reforms brought about in Liverpool by the municipality, Mr. Burns spoke of his own borough and the work of its council in providing counter attractions to the public-house and low music-hall. Special efforts had been made in Battersea on behalf of the young people by the organisation of municipal concerts, gymnasia for lads, and boy's clubs. The net loss to the Council for these social enterprises over a period of three years had been perhaps £1,000; and for that sum they had entertained and instructed 160,000 people. He concluded with an appeal to his hearers to win the supreme happiness of self-sacrifice on behalf of those who could not act for themselves. As our power and privilege, so was our duty. He saw a change for the better coming over London; and he was convinced its golden days lay ahead, days when it should become in William Dunbar's phrase, "London, gem of all joy."

THE Wesleyans have procured a freehold site at Plumstead upon which they are intending to build a Central Hall, to accommodate 1,500 people, a smaller hall to hold half as many, with various room for mothers' meetings, classes, committees. There will be living rooms for a caretaker, and for two resident Sisters. The whole is estimated to cost £18,500. It is believed that in 1905 it will be possible to open the building free of debt.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN addition to this month's Nineteenth Century and After, the editor has issued a most interesting catalogue of the contributors and contributions to the first twenty-five years of his Review. Under each letter of the alphabet in the list of authors the articles are arranged chronologically. Thus, under "M," we find in April, 1877, Dr. Martineau's contribution to the symposium on "Morality and Religious Belief"; in February, 1883, his article on "The Creed of Christendom"; in June and October, 1893, two articles on "The Gospel of Peter"; and in April, 1895, his review of Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief." The catalogue fills 161 pages, and is a valuable record of the Review, which, as the editor says, has maintained the principle of "free public discussion by writers invariably signing their own names." In the Review itself, we note Sir Wemyss Reid's chronicle of "Last Month," Professor Lehmann's article on "Hammurabi's Code," and Miss Edith Sellers' on "Shifting Scenes in Rural Workhouses."

The Independent Review in its third number has a second contribution towards an "Educational Concordat," suggesting a way of peace in the matter of religious teaching, on the ground that for a permanent settlement a place must be found for that teaching, though not by the State teachers, or at public expense. The President of Trinity College, Oxford, contributes some interesting reminiscences of Mommsen, and Mr. E. H. Young sketches a plan for the pacification of Macedonia, including, of course, the appointment of an independent Christian Governor.

The Monthly Review also has a pleasant article on Mommsen by Dr. Emil Reich, and the interesting religious discussion story or symposium, "The Veil of the Temple," is brought to a conclusion, though not to a satisfactory end, for the final confession of the leading spirit is: "We haven't got to the foundation." "I have much more to say." All that he has arrived at is that in looking for the foundation, "the Universe as revealed by science" is not the right place to dig. The Buxtons, representing the Balkan Committee, write on "Public Opinion and Macedonia."

The Contemporary is rich in articles of personal interest. It also tells of Mommsen; Sir Robert Hunter contributes a reminiscence of Sir Joshua Fitch; there is a long and very pleasant account of the King and Queen of Italy, and Archdeacon Boutflower furnishes "Some Sayings of Bishop Westcott." Among them, "The greatest thing in modern fiction is Romola—and that scene on the steps the greatest thing in it"; and this on Oxford:—

> "Oxford killed her two poets of this century—Matthew Arnold and Newman—and turned them both into second-rate theologians."
> The Bishop would say that he never could hear "Lead, kindly Light" without thinking what Newman might have done if he had not mistaken his calling.

The World's Work is to be congratulated on a happy birthday, having gained in its first year an assured place in the public regard. In this number, the "Talk with Mr. John Burns, M.P. — Life, Labour, and Hope," is specially noteworthy. There is an admirable full-page portrait of Mr. Burns, and also of Mr. J. A. Spender, editor of the Westminster Gazette, who writes on the Fiscal controversy.

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

THE CHRIST OF EXPERIENCE.

MR. CARPENTER brought to a close at Nottingham, on Monday last, his course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creed, and of Experience." The audiences exceeded expectation, and their response was enthusiastic and sincere throughout.

Mr. Carpenter said that in this last lecture on "The Christ of Experience," he would have to leave the sure ground of objective testimony and discuss the argument of those who appealed from historical criticism to inward witness. Spiritual things were spiritually discerned, and those who claimed to have experience of communion with the living Christ endeavoured to base on that experience the doctrine of his Deity. They found in the Pauline Epistles language which spoke of this living communion. But this experience was subsequently overlooked. It did not appear in the Synoptic Gospels or in the Book of Acts, where Christ is the risen Lord reserved in heaven. Peter and James, Clement and Barnabas, the Apocalypse and Hebrews were alike silent. In the Didache, in Hermas, and in the Apologies of Justin, in none of these is there any clear reference to such communion. But in the fourth Gospel and in Ignatius, the Pauline idea, which had fallen into neglect, comes again to view.

The lecturer then showed that in the cult of Isis, and especially in Mithraism, we had clear analogies. Communion through Christ with God had its parallel also in Franciscan records, which spoke of being "inseparably one through Francis in Christ."

The Evangelical testimony undeniably presented to us a sincere experience, whatever we might think of its interpretation. But, granting this, how can the soul in its moments of ecstatic communion recognise and discriminate between the persons in the Trinity or between the two natures in Christ? Dr. Beet said Christ was thus known because he is identified with the Spirit. "The Lord is the Spirit." Dr. Forrest says we cannot distinguish the persons, but we know that in such communion Christ is there because the Scriptures say so. Dr. Dale said we might affirm this independently of the Scripture on the strength of the continuity of Christian experience. But Dr. Forrest replied that this overlooked the problem how to control excesses and extravagances, and how to furnish the Evangelical with an adequate reply to Catholic superstitions. The lecturer, having emphasised these difficulties, proceeded to show that in the Gospels we had no hint of such mediation. Jesus, in the Lord's Prayer and in the parable of the Prodigal Son, teaches forgiveness without mediation. He kneels with us indeed, saying "Our Father"; but he does not interpose himself between us and God.

Mr. Carpenter then dealt with the similar Catholic experiences, which no reasonable Evangelical believing in the validity of his own, could possibly regard as merely gigantic illusions. Not only did this conviction centre in Christ, but also in answers to prayer, &c., in devotion to the Virgin, where we had a similar conviction that there was as immediate an access with the spirit of Mary as with the spirit of Christ. So, again, in India, in the personal devotion of worshippers to Krishna, who was one of the Avatara or incarnations of Vishnu. In Buddhism we had a yet more striking development. It was first believed that when Gotama died he had ceased to be. His memory was revered, his sayings treasured, pilgrimages were made to places associated with his life. Gradually there arose the idea that he was the incarnation of the Absolute, and immediately this begat a religion of communion. To-day we had a theistic Buddhism, in which the disciple, in communion with the eternal Buddha, partakes of the Buddha-nature. From this survey of religious experiences it was clear that communion was a universal fact, not limited to forms or persons or races, to ages or climes. The lecturer would not now ask how these experiences were to be reconciled, but they all expressed one fundamental reality, and evidenced one truth, that it was possible for the soul of man to enter into personal contact with that infinite spiritual Life we call God. By what means this communion is effected he could not tell, but of the reality of it he was well assured. The experiences of Catholic and Evangelical, of Buddhist and Christian, gave us a conception of the human soul surrounded by the Life of Life. Sometimes the barriers were broken down, and the spirit had insight into the source of its highest life. These moments came to different people under different conditions. On the mountain top, before the sea, while contemplating the breaking of the dawn, or listening to great music, the Heavenly Presence might be thus realised. Or, again, in sudden vast openings of intellectual illumination one might cry, "O God, I think Thy thoughts after Thee," or it might be in gleams and flashes of beauty, or in tracing the moving drama of human evolution, in which we discerned a purpose working out some end larger than we know: in such and other ways there was formed within us the conviction of a power ever with us. This power we saw in Christ, in the men and women we know, in teachers and poets, in great toilers for truth and righteousness, in the grandeur of the world, in the growth of the human spirit, in innumerable souls that called us forwards to far-off issues of justice and purity, of righteousness and truth and love. In God was our sufficiency, God our everlasting source, and our eternal goal.

At the close of the lecture, a most cordial vote of thanks was unanimously accorded to Mr. Carpenter on the motion of Mr. J. M. Perry, seconded by Mr. G. W. Barrows.

WHAT I want is not to possess religion, but to have a religion that shall possess me.—Charles Kingsley.

A GERMAN LIBERAL RELIGIOUS UNION.

DR. MARTIN RADE, of Marburg, is editor of Die Christliche Welt, a weekly liberal religious paper (now in its seventeenth year), which counts some 4,500 subscribers and circulates throughout Germany. It works for reform in the Church and the liberalising of religious thought, appealing not only to professed theologians, but to the laity as well. In a recent prospectus the editor declares his foundation principle: "Jesus Christ has not yet finished his work in the world, new streams of life flow forth from him in these modern times, and he remains lifted high above all spirits and powers, Saviour also of the twentieth century."

Dr. Rade is not only editor of this paper, but the moving spirit in an annual gathering of the "Friends of the Christliche Welt," which has been held for some years for conference on religious and theological subjects, and has numbered some of the leading liberal theologians among its members. The last gathering, which was held at Eisenach on September 29 and 30, was attended, at the request of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, by Miss Gertrud von Petzold, who, as our readers are aware, is studying for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford. On her return from Germany, Miss von Petzold presented an interesting report to the Committee, telling of the meetings at which Professors von Soden and Gunkel, of Berlin, Johannes Weiss, of Marburg, Wendt, of Jena, Dr. Weinel, of Bonn, and other well-known theologians were present. Professor Harnack has taken part in previous meetings, but was not there this year. The Christian idea of Revelation and the Relations of Church and State were the subjects for discussion at the two principal sessions, but another question was also raised, and a momentous decision arrived at, as will be seen from the particulars given in the following appeal.

ADDRESS OF DR. MARTIN RADE.*

To the Readers of the "Christliche Welt."

Those of us who met at Eisenach on Sept. 29 and 30 unanimously determined to form a "Union of the Friends of the Christian World" with a minimum yearly subscription of 2 marks (2s.).

Proposals for the organisation of our body have from the first been repeatedly made, but every time were almost unnaimously declined. If now the decision has appeared natural and inevitable, that can only be because the time is clearly ripe.

The decision was twice arrived at. First at an informal conference with tried friends in active work as ministers and teachers, where the matter was quite unexpectedly (so far as I was concerned) brought forward, and with no dissentient voice thoroughly discussed; and then on the second day, when the general meeting agreed to the proposal, and those who were present at the close of the meeting without exception signed their names as joining the organisation so formed.

The organisation is to be put at once into working order. The minimum subscription is so moderate that we must rely on the support of a very large number of our readers and friends, if the union is to carry out even its most immediate and most modest objects. What are those objects?

It is no question of the support of our paper the Christliche Welt. However thankful the editor might be for a wider circulation of the paper, there is no need to set so much machinery in motion for such an object; still less am I inclined to sacrifice my editorial freedom to any organisation, nor is that expected of me. The Christliche Welt will remain, therefore, as it is, yet ready for every possible effort for the improvement of its contents, prepared to give every consideration to the wishes of its friends.

The name "Union of the Friends of the Christian World" for the new organisation was adopted only as an expedient, because no one had any other suggestion to make: Whether, or how long it is retained must depend on future developments.

The immediate objects aimed at under this name are the greater effectiveness of our friends and those likeminded with us in every kind of good work, and the strengthening of our position in the Church. A fellowship in common thought such as ours has in fact no right permanently to stultify itself by refraining from organisation. A firmer bond of union must be established, so that the leading spirits amongst us, in all their efforts, may be in touch with one another, and the scattered friends for whom they speak may have that support. There must be the possibility, whenever in our circle a common purpose is stirring, to give it proper utterance in public at an appointed place. We have the feeling that we do not always receive in the church the consideration which from our numbers and our work is fairly due to us. Then, also, we allow many a stimulus, given at our meetings or otherwise, to pass fruitlessly away, because we have no instruments with which to retain or turn them to account.

The yearly subscriptions would be used in the first place to appoint an officer of the Union, what is usually called a general secretary, though we need not use that name. His business would be to carry on an extensive correspondence with the members, and by every means, e.g., by travelling, to keep the bond of union between the individual members and groups of members active and strong.

The organisation is, therefore, intended for the present to be purely central. How far it may put out local and provincial branches remains for future development to determine. Nor will any other societies, which may have been already formed here and there in various ways under the name of "Friends of the Christian World," be interfered with by our Union: our appeal is everywhere simply for individual members. And, similarly, there is no reason why membership in other unions and parties should hinder anyone from joining our organisation. We are, of course, all members of several societies. Whoever feels at all in sympathy with the position of the Christliche Welt, whoever wishes the spirit which is active in it in the meetings held under its name to become more vigorous and effective, is asked to help to that end by membership and subscription. His obligations to other organisations will clearly be thereby as little affected as hitherto by his purely spiritual relations with us.

There is no intention of binding us to a programme. Nevertheless, we shall take pains to give expression in a terse form of words to the common principle of which we are conscious. But that we need not hurry. On the other hand, we shall at once form a free committee, as head of the Union, in which the more important countries and churches of the Empire will be represented. (We hope also that other countries, and Switzerland and Austria, in the first instance, will to that extent participate.)

Finally, the Eisenach resolution appeared to us all very simple and natural, timely, and necessary. May this be further proved, in response to our present communication, by the adhesion of a large number of our readers as members.

For the rest, what is required in this matter is confidence. In confidence the resolution at Eisenach was arrived at, and we ask the confidence of our readers in that resolution. God grant that something may come of this to His glory, for the welfare of His Church, and the spreading of His truth!

In the next number of the Christliche Welt (Oct. 22) Dr. Rade announced that the following, among others, had consented to act on the committee of the new Union:—Professor Baumgarten, of Kiel; Professor Gottschick, of Tübingen; Dr. Guttmann, a schoolmaster at Dortmund; Professor von Saden, of Berlin; Professor Tröltsch, of Heidelberg; Professor Johannes Weiss, of Marburg; Privatdocent Otto, of Göttingen; clergymen from Gotha, Frankfort, Dresden, Görlitz, and others. He also announced that a large number of members had been enrolled, and that a first paper of confidential communications to members would be issued during the present year. It was actually issued on Nov. 10.

Friends in this country who sympathise with the movement, and are willing to subscribe to its support, will be cordially welcomed as members. Their adhesion to the Vereinigung der Freunde der Christlichen Welt should be sent (with name and address distinctly written, and the name of their church or denomination) to Dr. Martin Rade, Verlag der Christlichen Welt in Marburg i.H., Germany. The amount of the subscription should also be added, and sent to Dr. Rade by post-office order or cheque. It will be seen from the following letter which we have received from Miss von Petzold, with reference to Dr. Rade's appeal, that she is willing to receive the subscriptions of intending members.

SIR,—There are only one or two words which I should like to add to the above appeal of Dr. Rade's, namely, to point out the deep significance of the opportunity here offered to all who are in favour of liberal religious thought and study.

The appeal, no doubt, is cautiously worded, and may even strike the uninitiated British reader as somewhat vague and aimless. For this very reason it is incumbent on me to point out that, on the one hand, the readers and friends of the

* A few sentences of temporary application are omitted from this translation.

Christian World—which is the chief, if not the only, organ of liberal religious thought in Germany—know, of course, perfectly well what the aims of the paper are; and, on the other, are as anxious as Unitarians in this country have ever been not to formulate their tenets in a dogmatic way, but to leave as wide a scope as possible for the future development of the Society which by this new organisation is to be strengthened for its task of liberalising religious thought in Germany.

How easily that is stated, and yet what an enormous work it will prove, even though undertaken by the first theologians and scholars of the country! Are British Unitarians in sympathy with this work? If so, are they prepared to become members of the new society? They are invited to do so on the same terms with their German brethren; invited to work hand in hand with them at their annual conference, which usually takes place in Eisenach; but there is no reason why it should not at some future time assemble somewhat nearer to this country. For that will alone depend on the strength and influence of British members.

What more, then, can I say to bring this matter home to them? I know too well some of the shortcomings, the painful limitations of Unitarianism as an isolated, small religious body. Still, I here speak as one who has learned to love it for its earnest striving, its ready response to all things that are noble and true; as one who yearns to open out for them a wider sphere of work and influence, a greater opportunity of fellowship. Ought they not to remember how much they owe to German scholarship, which through decades of unwearied research has succeeded in establishing Unitarianism on a scientific basis, and which is now stretching out a hand of fellowship to them? Ought they not to use this opportunity, which may not offer itself again for a long time, but which now may become a firm bond of union between them and the foremost theologians of the day?

Dr. Martin Rade, Marburg, Germany, as I myself, will be glad to supply forms of application and receive subscriptions from intending members.

GERTUD VON PETZOLD.

Manchester College, Oxford.

Miss von Petzold speaks of the Christliche Welt as the chief, if not the only organ of liberal religious thought in Germany; but we must not forget the Protestantenblatt, the weekly organ of the Protestantenverein, with editors in Bremen and Berlin, and published by Schünemann at Bremen. With last week's issue of this paper a supplement "Zur Kirchlichen Zeitgeschichte" is published, which opens with a vigorous declaration of principles and appeal to the liberal laity in the church. We gather that the Protestantenverein is not wholly convinced of the wisdom of Dr. Rade's new organisation, but hopes that it may develop fruitful activity, making for new life in Church and nation.

LITERATURE.

ON A STUDY TABLE.

WITH unwearied industry Mr. John M. Robertson places beside his volume on Christianity and Mythology (formerly noticed in these columns) a group of four studies under the name of Pagan Christs.* They are entitled "The Rationale of Religion," "Secondary God-making," "Mithraism," and "The Religions of Ancient America." The first of these is chiefly a criticism of Mr. F. B. Jevons, but deserves attention for its insistance on the sociological aspects of the development or religion. The main thesis of the book is produced in the second essay, where the author out-Frazers the famous chapter of The Golden Bough. Not only does he maintain that "the Gospel Story of the Last Supper, Passion, Betrayal, Trial, Crucifixion, and Resurrection, is visibly a transcript of a mystery Drama," he does not, with Mr. Frazer, admit the historical reality of Jesus of Nazareth; the most that he will concede is that Christianity finds "a quasi-historic basis in a Jesus who appears to have been put to death by stoning and hanging about a century before the death of Herod" (p. 90). The author is, of course, entitled to his opinions. But he is not entitled to claim support for them by constant inaccuracy, or by suppression of evidence, or by treating the wildest conjectures as historic facts. It is part of his view that a "Jesus the son of the Father" was a figure in an old Semitic ritual of sacrifice before the Christian era. This is then justified as follows:—

> The Syrian form of the name, Yeschu, closely resembles the Hebrew name Yishak, which we read Isaac, and that Isaac was in earlier myth sacrificed by his father is a fair presumption. We have here the inferrible norm of an ancient God-sacrifice, Abraham's original Godhood being tolerably certain, like that of Israel. In Arab legend, Ishmael is sacrificed by his father, though apparently the sacrifice is commuted for a ram, in the manner of the story in Genesis.

Well may the author look on his work and find it very good; for he concludes, "As a hypothesis the proposed solution must for the present stand" (p. 154). The next step is to prove that there was a pre-Christian cult of a Jesus or Joshua. This is done by identifying the successor of Moses with the "Angel" of Exodus xxiii. 20, who is again identified in the Talmud with the mystic Metatron, who is in turn identifiable with the Logos, and the triumphant conclusion follows: "Thus the name Joshua = Jesus is already in the Pentateuch associated with the conceptions of Logos, Son of God, and Messiah" (p. 155).

No historical student needs to be warned against these preposterous assertions. But the unwary reader may easily be dazzled by the wide array of references (many of which are very useful to the collector of critical curiosities), the legitimate product of extensive reading. The mischief is that Mr. Robertson does not understand what evidence is, and is the easy prey, therefore, of Talmudic vagaries. Of course, if he sets aside the Christian Gospels, he naturally undervalues the historical testimony of the Buddhist books. But when he asserts that "it is certain that most of what Buddhists accept as Buddha's teaching was penned long after Asoka's time" (p. 261), he is flying in the face of the evidence gathered in recent years from inscriptions in different parts of India, which shows the existence in the third century B.C. not only of particular passages cited by name, but also of the titles of the collections in which the teaching was grouped.

In passing to Mithraism, the writer opens his discussion with a complaint that Professor W. Robertson Smith as editor of the Encyclopædia Britannica, only allowed one column to Mithra and his cult, while he inserted "some hundreds of pages on certain books of the Hebrew Bible" (p. 289). This is a characteristic inaccuracy. We have counted fourteen articles (we hope we have not omitted any) on the Bible and certain books of the Old Testament, bearing the familiar signature, "W. R. S." They cover in all forty-eight pages. With M. Cumont to help him, Mr. Robertson should not go far astray. But a further instance must be cited by way of illustration of the writer's inability to use his materials. "The first day of the week (he tells us), Sunday, was apparently from time immemorial consecrated to Mithra by Mithraists; and as the Sun-god was preeminently 'the Lord,' Sunday was 'the Lord's day' long before the Christian era" (p. 318). In support of this assertion we are sent back to a note on p. 170, "That the word Kuriakos is not a Christian coinage is now fully established," with a reference to Deissmann (not Deismann) on the "Lord's Day" in Encyclopædia Biblica. Mr. Robertson's statements require him to show (1) that Mithra was called Kurios, and (2) that his worshippers gave the name Kuriakê to the first day of the week before the Christian era. The first he does not attempt to prove. In Cumont's list of epithets of Mithra, the god is nowhere called kurios; though the Sun-god (without Mithra's name) is called Dominus. Drexler, in his elaborate list of gods to whom the epithet kurios was applied (in Roscher's Lexikon), does not quote a single instance for Mithra. But, secondly, Mr. Robertson misunderstands Deissmann's evidence. It used to be supposed (for instance, see Thayer-Grimm, as late as 1896) that the word kuriakos was of Christian origin, and was limited to Biblical and ecclesiastical use; Jülicher, for example, conjectured that Paul was its inventor. Deissmann has shown from inscriptions and papyri from Egypt and Asia Minor that the word was in use in the sense of "imperial," especially in matters of taxation. But he cites no instance of its application to designate a day. That is the unwarranted inference of our author, who ascribes its use to the Mithra-worshippers "long before the Christian era" without a shadow of justification. It is painful to write thus of a student who is undoubtedly in earnest. The general impression which his work produces is that his mythological combinations applied to Christianity are worthless and misleading, and that no single statement can be trusted without verification.

The results of the valuable researches of Professor Cumont on the worship of Mithra under the Roman empire are now open to all English readers in the little volume on The Mysteries of Mithra, sent across from Chicago by the Open Court Publishing Company.* It is a translation into English of Professor Cumont's own summary, by Mr. Thomas J. McCormack. The second French edition (1902) has been used, with the addition of a large number of valuable illustrations; the French edition having only 21 figures besides the frontispiece, while the American contains fifty. The valuable map, showing the distribution of the Mithraic cult from Babylon to Great Birtain, has been retained, and a useful index is appended. The singularly limpid style of the original loses some of its grace in translation; one may wish here and there for a less cumbrous phrase, as "a categorical system of ethics," for une morale impérative (p. 191); but the general rendering seems sufficiently exact. For "the devas, who inhabit the places of darkness" (p. 3), Mr. McCormack is not responsible. It is a pity to use the Sanskrit form which is always associated with the radiant dwellers in the light. It would have been better had M. Cumont adhered to the Avestan spelling daevas, which distinguishes the Iranian powers of evil from their older Vedic kin. Those who wish to see a masterly summary of difficult investigations, and to get a first-rate guide to the study of a cult which showed extraordinary parallels to some of the ideas of early Christianity will find invaluable help in this little volume. The story is also rehearsed briefly, but with abundant scholarship, by Professor Julius Grill (of Tübingen), in a lecture entitled Die Persische Mysterienreligion im Römischen Reich und das Christenthum.† In Rome the Mithraic clergy about 250 A.D. numbered 155 persons; they supported more than 1,500 poor; and so, "on a moderate estimate," grimly says the evangelical theologian, "they deceived at least 30,000 souls!" No such innuendoes will be found in Professor Cumont's pages. His work is a model of learning, insight, and impartiality.

J. E. C.

On Nov. 29, the day of his last Sunday evening lecture at Cambridge, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter conducted a morning service at the Brahmo Prayer Meeting. About twenty young men, English and Indian, met at 45, Panton-street, and joined the service. Mr. B. C. Ghosh read Ps. xv., and offered the Invocation. Then two others of the congregation gave readings from the Old and the New Testaments. As there was no arrangement for singing, the hymns were read by one of the students present. Mr. Carpenter then followed with a prayer and an impressive sermon. One result of the service has been that at least a few more young members of the University are taking interest in the projected regular Sunday Services at Cambridge from next term.

HAPPY ENGLAND.*

Lovers of England who can afford to buy this beautiful book may be counted happy indeed in its possession, and we should like to think that such a gift will gladden many homes this Christmas time. Here are eighty of Mrs. Allingham's pictures, the exquisite water-colours reproduced with the utmost skill, engraved and printed in colours by the new "three-colour process," which appears to us a real triumph both for science and art. The pictures are, of course, reduced in size, but not overmuch, nor so as to destroy their unfailing charm. Here are lovely glimpses of Surrey woods and meadows, open commons and wide stretches of the country, Blackdown, and, again, Hindhead from Witley Common, bits of road or garden paths leading up to the quaintest cottages; or sometimes it is just a mass of flowers, like the south border in an old garden, or the summer garden out of which one passes over a style to the wood beyond; or the field of ox-eye daisies, near Westerham, in Kent; or the heather on Crockham Hill. Very often there are children or other contented creatures, happy in the peaceful country; or, for a change, the children are playing by the seaside, or at lessons at home, or blowing bubbles in the garden. Ruskin delighted in these, and spoke once of Mrs. Allingham's true gift "in representing the gesture, character, and humour of charming children in country landscapes"; and again in his lectures on modern art at Oxford (as quoted by Mr. Huish) he declared that "though long by academic art denied or resisted, at last bursting out like one of the sweet Surrey fountains, all dazzling and pure, you have the radiance and innocence of reinstated infant divinity showered again among the flowers of English meadows of Mrs. Allingham." Then there is a special interest in the pictures of Tennyson's home, Farringford, in the Isle of Wight, and other scenes close by, and the garden at Aldworth, the poet's other home, with its wide view over the Weald of Sussex. Milton's house at Chalfont St. Giles is the subject of one of the most charming of the village pictures, and there is also the famous picture of the Old Men's Garden, Chelsea Hospital, and "The Young Customers," illustrating Mrs. Ewing's "Flat Iron for a Farthing," which won for Mrs. Allingham election into the Society of Painters in Water Colours. All the pictures, except two from Ireland and two of Venice at the end, belong to England, and amply justify the title of the book, for which the editor's apology and explanation might well have been spared.

Indeed, of the letterpress altogether, though required to make the book, and frankly acknowledged by Mr. Huish as written to fill out the necessary number of pages, it must be confessed that it is hardly worthy of its subject. If only Mrs. Allingham could have been persuaded to write her own reminiscences and comments, to tell of her early struggles as an artist, and of her aunt, Laura Herford, who was the first woman student to gain admission to the Royal Academy Schools, of Ruskin and Carlyle, near whom she and her husband lived at Chelsea, and of Tennyson, who also was a cordial friend, something really notable might have been achieved; but as it is, though Mr. Huish gives us the necessary biographical particulars and other interesting information, we very soon grow tired of his comments on the pictures, and are content to pass them over or simply glean from them a few matters of fact. Happily there are eighty of the pictures, and they speak for themselves, so that we need not trouble too much about the padding.

At the time of her marriage, in 1874, Mrs. Allingham as Helen Paterson had already won her own battle as an independent artist. Born in 1848, at Burton-on-Trent, her childhood was spent at Altrincham, where her father, Dr. A. H. Paterson, took up a medicel practice. Her mother was a sister of Miss Laura Herford, and of Dr. Brooke Herford. On her father's death, in 1862, of diphtheria, caught from a patient, the family removed to Birmingham, where her art training began; five years later Miss Paterson made her way to London, and became a student at the Royal Academy. Mr. Huish tells of her first successes as an illustrator, working for Aunt Judy's Magazine, Cornhill, and the Graphic: and then of her marriage to William Allingham, the poet, and friend of Tennyson and Carlyle, at that time editor of Fraser's Magazine. The first years of their married life were spent, as above stated, at Chelsea, to be near Carlyle; but after his death the Allinghams removed, in 1881, to Witley, in Surrey. Then followed seven and a half rich years of country life, until Mr. Allingham's death in 1889; how rich in delight in that lovely country, and how productive of Mrs. Allingham's best work may be gathered from many of the pictures in this book.

Critics have complained that Mrs. Allingham's art is narrow in its range, that, confined to the country and homely country life, it pictures one side only of that life. For our own part, we can find here no cause for complaint or regret, but are more than content to be grateful for the pure delight of these quiet scenes. There are, of course, darker aspects of life, yet the brightest is also true, and it is good to be able to rejoice with unalloyed happiness in the sunshine and the flowers and the children at their play, and to wander, though it be only in imagination, through these by-ways of perfect English country. One who sees all the beauty as Mrs. Allingham sees it, and can so interpret it for others, and now in such a book as this gives them the treasure to keep by them within city walls and through dark winter days, is a true friend of the people, whose long labour of love has not been rendered in vain.

THE PROBLEM OF FREETHOUGHT IN FRANCE.*

WHETHER or no there can be any rapprochement between the freethinker and the liberal religious thinker, is a question of lively and practical interest to all who describe themselves under either of these names. It is ably discussed by M. Buisson and M. Wagner, indeed, their discussion is probably as able as any of its kind. And if neither of the two has really said the last word, or settled the question for us, each has done something towards its clearer statement and made a solution more possible. We are convinced that a solution is not only possible, but that it is becoming increasingly desirable, and that there are already some men, at least, who combine in themselves both sides of this controversy—men whose thought and character is even more comprehensive than that displayed in these fascinating pages, and it is to these men that many are looking for intellectual leadership in the world of religious thought.

The present volume results from the action of M. Buisson in joining the National (French) Association of Freethinkers, and presiding over their "Fête de la Raison" held last winter at the Trocadéro; and from criticisms made by the Protestant upon these actions. M. Buisson defends himself and carries the war into the enemy's camp, asserting the necessity for Liberal Protestantism of an open alliance with Freethought; and M. Wagner offers a vigorous rejoinder. There is so much force in the arguments of each that we are only half-convinced by either; and, indeed, there is no doubt they have much common ground, and are very good friends.

Briefly M. Buisson's position is this: he regards the true Freethinkers as the heirs of the Reformation, and all other Protestants as more or less consciously seeking to make terms with the old enemy by a sort of expurgated orthodoxy. Protestantism, even Liberal Protestantism, vegetates in its churches: the real world of living thought and progress is outside. He urges it to be absolutely frank, and to countenance no longer any compromise with dead formulas and doctrines. All religions derive their vitality from the moral impulse of humanity. Freethought recognises this, and by tearing off all the paraphernalia of doctrine, and of ceremony, focusses attention upon the life itself. "There is no other religious emotion," he says in a very fine passage, "than that which is produced by the direct contact of the human soul with one of the forms of that ideal which it calls by turn the true, the good, the beautiful, and which Socrates, four centuries before Christianity, called the divine, or God." Freethought is only irreligious for the sake of religion; if it denies God, it is that it may humanise the divine, may idealise duty and socialise morality. It regards the Church as the greatest of all anti-moral influences, and cannot too strongly mark its rupture with that institution and its methods of thought. Man and human nature is at the root of all religions, and the purpose of all religions can only be the amelioration of man and of society. In order that they may assert this, says M. Buisson, the Liberal Protestants of France should definitely throw in their lot with the true Freethinkers.

To all this which, on the whole, is admirably put, M. Wagner replies in the following manner: The Reformation cannot be said to come to flower in Freethought. On the contrary, the principle of the Reformation was a deepening of that religious consciousness which appears to be more or less incomprehensible to the Freethinker. It is precisely this religious consciousness of personal relation to the living God which is the raison d'être of Liberal Protestantism: Freethought with its logic, its science, its overwhelming confidence in the intellect cannot take the place of this as a principle of religious life. Liberal Protestantism is not opposed to Catholicism on the ground of faith, but of freedom in faith. Its adherents are of every faith—neither of one nor of none. They are a group of constructive, not of destructive workers. Doctrines represent the facts of faith; we cannot give them up, we can only re-assert, re-interpret them. The personal relation with God; the pre-eminence of Jesus and of the Bible, among men and books; the paramount importance of prayer; the validity even of the miraculous—these are not matters to be repudiated; they have been proved to us by our experience. We have rediscovered the meaning of the past, and it is ours to make it plain to the people. This we are endeavouring to do. The spirit of the Gospel is the largest, the finest, the most authentically human that has ever breathed; to that we seek to be found faithful. We recognise that you also are actuated by noble motives; but what could any union between us be worth which was built upon the denial of all that is most vital in our thought?

In such a sketch as this it is impossible to do justice to either side. But in each we feel the same high nobility of spirit, and the same earnest ethical purpose. Perhaps M. Buisson thinks more of the future, M. Wagner more of the past. Paradoxical as it sounds, it is possible that the former is, at the last resort, the more passionately religious of the two. But M. Wagner's thought appeals more to our own, and we are better satisfied that he should have the last word. Sometimes we could fancy his tone savours a little of condescension; but we may mistake him, and we eagerly admit that there are few men, and perhaps, fewer ministers of religion who could keep so difficult a discussion upon so magnanimous and just a level.

Both M. Wagner and M. Buisson are optimists. By different paths they have come into the same faith, the same service: it matters comparatively little that they base their faith on diverse experience—indeed, behind the divergence of their thought the reader may catch sight of a broad basis of unity. Outward union may not come along the lines of religious belief; but we believe that even now a religion of love and of service is drawing such men as these together into a fellowship perhaps more potent and essential than that of any church. OBITUARY.

SIR JOHN R. ROBINSON.

FUNERAL SERVICE.

THE funeral of the late Sir John Robinson took place last Saturday, the service at Essex Church being followed by cremation at Golder's Hill, and the subsequent interment of the ashes at Highgate Cemetery.

The service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, and, in addition to members of the family, there was a representative gathering of friends at Essex Church. Among those present were Sir John Macdonnell, Sir R. Giffen, Mr. Charles Morley, M.P., and Mr. Mackenzie Bell (of the Athenæum Club), with the following members of the Reform Club: Sir R. Hunter, Mr. Rupert Potter, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, and others. Among former associates in the work of the Daily News were Mr. E. T. Cook, Mr. Richard Whiteing, Mr. Moy Thomas, and Mr. Corrie Grant, M.P. The present Editor of the Daily News was there, and other members of the staff, and the Editor of THE INQUIRER. The Dr. Williams' trustees were represented by Mr. T. Smith Osler and the Revs. S. Farrington and F. W. Stanley. There was solemn organ music at the beginning and at the close of the simple funeral service.

Mr. Freeston in the course of the service gave an address, in which he spoke of laborious years of faithful service closing with well-earned rest; and, having referred to Sir John Robinson's simplicity of character and unaffected modesty, continued:—"He never belied his early training. A son of the pulpit, he inherited through three generations of Nonconformist ministers a fine and unbroken tradition of civil and religious freedom, which, in a different but kindred profession, he nobly upheld and maintained to the end. When the last Poet Laureate sang his ode of 'The Golden Year' to which all look forward, the time when each man's rule shall be all men's good, he placed side by side, as twin means of progress, the mission of the Cross and the message of the Press. It is not too much to claim—it were less than justice not to claim—that Sir John Robinson from the very beginning regarded and honoured his journalistic calling with the high meaning of a mission, and in a special sense made his Daily News a strong force for righteousness. Let those testify who knew him most intimately. It is his closest friend and his oldest living fellow journalist who declares: 'The profession of which he was so long an ornament has many brilliant names in its ranks, but I speak deliberately when I say that no one more consistently maintained its honour and reputation.' It is his own successor who avers that his chief greatness lay in his devotion to the high ideals of honour and veracity, and that faithfulness to principle which knew not a single departure or surrender. 'When his life-story is made known to the world it will be found a splendid record of large-hearted, unselfish, and unfailing service in the cause of humanity and righteousness.'"

Having then recalled some of Sir John Robinson's most striking services, to which reference was made in our memorial notice last week, Mr. Freeston added:—"Nothing tests a man more to the hilt than his dealing with an opponent. He bore that test throughout. According to the evidence of the friend who knew him best, he was not only most scrupulous in the defence of his own opinions, but never used harsh language towards others, never imputed discreditable motives, always showed an admirable temper, and an unfailing courtesy in his conduct of public controversy. Of his private life we may not speak too intimately, but the impressions he made on those who met him frequently, in his office, on committee, at his club, in the theatre, or elsewhere, form together a happy picture of his kindly and sunny nature. Gentle, gracious, generous, humorous, full of good stories, and knowing how to tell them, fond of young children, loyal to old servants, uniformly considerate to his staff, emotionally affectionate to those who had once won his heart, holding no kindly office for his friends too troublesome or difficult, he must indeed have revealed to others, and enjoyed himself > that best portion of a good man's life,

> His little nameless unremembered acts
> Of kindness and of love.

"If ever death can lose its bitterness, surely it is when it thus comes to an honoured and mellowed old age, when life has nobly done its work and fulfilled its promise, when rest comes as a sleep from which shall dawn a wondrous awakening. We thank God for all good men, and we pray that we may have grace to follow them."

THE Wesleyan papers and speakers are beginning to grapple in earnest with the arguments and preachings of Robert Blatchford. The almost exaggerated courtesy with which the battle is fought indicates a due estimate, if not over-estimate, of Mr. Blatchford's influence. No doubt it is wisest as well as kindliest to err on that side. In a leader of the Methodist Times, a sentence is quoted which it is said that Christ would have approved and St. James might have written; further on John Wesley is called the eighteenth century Clarion. Compliment could hardly be carried further.

THE problem of how best to use the "City church" faces all denominations. Some of the Anglican clergy arrange for brief organ recitals and short services between one and two o'clock in the City churches in London. Joseph Parker made the Thursday mid-day service at the City Temple famous, and it is well maintained under the Rev. R. J. Campbell. The Rev. Silvester Horne has recently started a mid-day service on Wednesdays at the Whitefield Tabernacle. Amongst other Nonconformist noon services there is one at Bishopsgate Chapel, and another recently started at Westbourne Grove Chapel, not to speak of the occasional Merchants' Lecture at Austin Friars. Some of the Nonconformist churches might equally as well be left open for rest and meditation as those of the Establishment. Many of them would be of historic interest to visitors.

IV.

"LOVE doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not its own, is not provoked, taketh not account of evil."

Anyone who has this large-hearted love cannot help loving whatsoever things are true, and honourable, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report. And not only in great things is this true, but it will guide and influence him in things that seem quite small. It will prevent our being rough and rude and ill-behaved; it cannot "behave itself unseemly."

In little everyday acts what a difference this spirit makes. It makes us careful and considerate to others; keeps us from shouting and screaming about the streets and roads so as to annoy other people; and from throwing our papers about and disfiguring the beautiful country which God has made, and which we should help Him to keep beautiful, or the streets where even a few thoughtless people can make things so unsightly. These and many other things are "unseemly."

In a London street where straw had been put down to dull the sound of the noises because someone in one of the houses was very ill, some children were playing, throwing the straw about and shouting and screaming. I went to speak to them, and they stopped playing and gathered round to listen, whilst I explained why it was there and what was going on in that room with the blinds down. Their eyes followed mine up to the bedroom window, and when I stopped speaking they all sauntered quietly away, without another shout. The kindness and "love" were there, ready to be called out; but they had not thought about anything except that the straw was a nice plaything.

"Love seeketh not its own." This love makes a person always think more of others than of himself. A person is most disagreeable who is always on the lookout for himself; who says, "Give it to me," "I want it," "It's mine," "I did this"; and it is so different if you have a companion who is kind and generous, and always thinks first of what will please his friends. If we let ourselves be selfish when we are children the habit will grow, and we shall be still more selfish when we are older, and a very sad thing happens, which is that we grow blind to it, and are no longer able to see that we are selfish. The habit of selfishness may lead to grievous consequences, as when in a shipwreck the people scramble for the boats, trying each to save himself—often all losing their lives as a consequence. And the habit of unselfishness may lead to noble deeds, as when the captain and sailors, without offering to go themselves, put all the passengers into the boats first, and take their chance afterwards. Some have wife and children at home, and you can picture to yourselves what it must be to see the raging sea, and the boats going one by one, and to know that you cannot go. Cannot? Why not? Because you cannot be unfaithful to that love which constrains you to care more for others than yourself.

Once in a shipwreck all the boats had been sent off and all the life-belts given out. The life-belts had just gone round, and the captain only was left. He was just going to put on his belt and leap into the sea when one man more came up from the cabin. There was no life-belt for him. The two men looked at each other: they both understood: and the poor man's face was white and horrified. The captain quickly said, "You have a wife and children," gave him the life-belt, and before he could speak the captain had leaped into the sea to take his chance of a spar or an oar, and of some passing ship. But he was never seen again; and the man with the life-belt was picked up and got home.

But I want to say a few words to you, children, about the little everyday thoughts and things that make up most of our life. Especially I want you to be more unselfish to your parents. I see children every day—nice good children, too—who are very thoughtless to their parents. Everything is done to please the children; the children do not think enough of their parents. Could not you look out to do something for your fathers and mothers, instead of their always doing everything for you? The very smallest things would make a difference: not to grumble when something is refused; not to worry and interrupt at every time that suits yourself, without regard to your mother's convenience; to run errands for her; to carry parcels for her; to fetch her shoes when she comes in tired. A hundred little things a loving and thoughtful child will find if he looks out for them; but if you don't look out the chances will slip by without you noticing them.

"Love is not provoked; taketh not account of evil." It is most trying when you find people who are always taking offence. It is a bad form of selfishness, to think that they are not considered, that things are done on purpose to hurt or injure them, that they are neglected; or to quarrel easily instead of being kind and generous. You often see it in games; if a boy does not succeed, he lays the blame on everything but himself, and gets cross, and says it "wasn't fair." That is "taking account of evil," being ready to see evil. But if he was a generous boy, and himself incapable of evil thoughts, he would not suppose them in others; if he attributes "evil" to others, it is that his own heart is not filled with the love and generosity which turn out the evil, and leave no room for it, If we treat people who seem unkind and selfish as if they meant to be good and generous, they will often respond by being really what we suppose them to be. Never return evil with evil, but always with good.

In remembering to do these things because we know they are right, even if at first we would rather only please ourselves, we shall grow to love the better way, and feel that it is really the only good way. Each of us can only do a little in the right way; but it will grow a broader and broader way, and the light of love will brighten it more and more.

LONDON, DECEMBER 12, 1903.

"IN THE INTEREST OF THE GOVERNED."

WE have received from Mr. H. A. R. JOY, with whose initials our readers will be not unfamiliar, an earnestly and ably written pamphlet on "Our Relations with Aboriginal Peoples, with Special Reference to Queensland," in which he seeks to give answers to three questions :—

(1) Is the stronger race ever justified in coercing the weaker ; and, more particularly, is it ever justifiable to occupy alien territory by a forceful invasion ?

(2) Being in the position of a dominant Power, what principles ought to actuate our dealings with subject peoples ?

(3) As a matter of practical politics, how best shall we endeavour to actualise our ideal ?

Mr. JOY, of course, answers his first question in the affirmative, though justly stringent in his definition of what constitutes justification. Our concern for the moment, however, is rather with the answer to the second question.

> A fundamental principle of British Empire-making [he says] is to grant self-government to a subject people as soon as presumably capable of duly exercising it ; and to govern for their own betterment races not capable of self-government. . . . It is adequately understood by legislature and executive that civilisation must be safeguarded against barbarism. But it is very inadequately understood that no government is just which does not equally safeguard barbarians against civilisation.

Writing from direct knowledge, Mr. JOY proceeds to discuss how far the colonists of Queensland have put these principles into effect in their dealings with the aborigines. He refuses to tell "of unnumbered men 'shot at sight' as a mere convenience, of habitual debauchery of women by intimidation or by purchase with a plug of tobacco, of outraged children whose midnight terrors add the last touch of horror to the orgies of a drovers' camp, of sallies of the police in masquerade of legal 'settlements' by slaughter and rapine." "These things," he says, "in all their sickening detail have not missed illustrative record. They may serve to decrease the wonder that it has become habitual to speak of the 'Black-Fellow' as hopelessly degraded." Mr. JOY's concern, however, is with the remedy, and he advocates the scheme of Mr. ARCHIBALD MESTON for the complete segregation of the aborigines in large reserves under a white Protector and a government adapted to their character; the men only to leave their native handicrafts within the reserves, in parties of not less than fifty under their own responsible guardian, for strictly defined labour, mainly on public works.

But Mr. JOY's analysis of the principles which ought to actuate our dealings with aboriginal peoples is capable of fruitful application in other areas than in Queensland. It was semi-officially announced on Monday that Mr. R. CASEMENT, our Consul on the Congo, has just reached this country on the completion of a mission "specially undertaken, at the instance of the British Government, for the purpose of ascertaining from personal observation the condition of the natives on the Upper Congo." The tour, we are told, was to have lasted six months, "but at the expiration of two months the scenes witnessed and the information obtained were of such a character that it was decided that further evidence on the matter under investigation was unnecessary." Mr. CASEMENT is now engaged in drawing up his report for the Foreign Office. In this report, it is declared, "it will be shown, on the undeniable authority of a British official, that the most horrible outrages are still being perpetrated under the rubber régime, and that slavery and barbarism in the most revolting forms exist to-day." This is no news to those who have read the reports sent home from time to time by missionaries and others who have penetrated the territory of the so-called Congo Free State. But it is well that the facts should be presented to Europe in a form which shall make it impossible to attribute the charges, as hitherto, to the vapourings of irresponsible sentimentalists. The Congo Free State Government owes its existence to a charter issued under an International Act of European Powers under stipulations almost every one of which is now completely and habitually violated. Our own Government have been tardily aroused to action in the matter, and, armed with Mr. CASEMENT'S report, it is impossible to believe that they will not quickly secure the effective intervention of the signatory Powers.

The supposed interests of trade, so often and so widely put forward at the expense of the higher interests of justice and humanity, have by this Congo Government been used to cover the infliction of wholesale murder, outrage, maiming, torture, and, of course, robbery, in order to compel the wretched natives to bring up to the depôts of the Government or their licensees arbitrarily fixed contributions of rubber and other produce. When, therefore, the official facts are made public their use will extend beyond the object of the moment of securing better treatment for the Congolese. They will illustrate the standing danger of allowing free play to the purely commercial instinct without reference to higher considerations. Our South African Colonies are menaced with a sinister conspiracy which, if successful, would finally destroy the hope of making these regions a prosperous and contented province of the Empire. Reduced wages and bad conditions of employment having diminished the supply of native labour in the gold mines, the mineowners, instead of improving the pay and the conditions, as employers elsewhere have to do in similar circumstances, are demanding that Chinese labour shall be imported wholesale under conditions which mean virtual slavery ; and in spite of the unanimous opposition of the rest of the white inhabitants of South Africa, there is grave fear that the Transvaal Government may ultimately yield to their importunity. If they do, it will be on the plea advanced by the mineowners that the prosperity of South Africa depends on the mines being kept working and further developed by an abundant supply of cheap labour.

The plea, however, is without foundation, The prosperity of South Africa depends upon remunerative employment being found for its present inhabitants, white and black, and such employment depends, in its turn, upon the revival of agriculture and the trade that follows it, at least as much as upon the development of the mines. Cheap labour may swell the dividends of the shareholders at home ; but if it does, that will not necessarily increase South African prosperity. It is because they fear the power, political and industrial, of the white miner that the mineowners are seeking to import Chinamen to supplement the supply of blacks; for Australian experience with high and low-grade mines alike has shown that well-paid white labour, by its superior intelligence, is as economical in the end as black. In its essence the problem which faces us in the Transvaal, on the Congo, and in Queensland is one and the same: Are the aims and demands of private individuals, intent only upon getting rich and utterly careless of the rights and the welfare of those whom they find in their path, to be allowed to override all other considerations, and to make us false to the great principle that all government should be in the interest of the governed ? "A fundamental principle of British Empire-making is to grant self-government to a subject people so soon as presumably capable of duly exercising it, and to govern for their own betterment races not capable of self-government."

HERBERT SPENCER.

ANOTHER of the few remaining master-minds who shaped the thought of the nineteenth century has passed into the unseen world. Whether Herbert Spencer will permanently hold a place among the greatest philosophers of all time may be open to question; but if, as Kant maintained, it is the will and the sustained effort to reach the true and the good which constitutes a man's real worth, then, assuredly, this life-long truthseeker and devoted lover of his fellow-men ranks among the souls who are nearest and dearest to the Eternal One.

A Noble Character.

The essential nobility of the character of the great Evolutionist is manifest in the heroic perseverance with which, in spite of the obstacles which frequent ill-health presented, he ever struggled onward and upward till he had achieved the mighty intellectual task which he had planned in his early manhood. Not personal ambition, but only supreme devotion to a divinely inspired ideal can explain that force of character which enabled him to surmount all difficulties and to carry out to its completion a noble work which for years brought him more loss than gain, more adverse criticism than glory. In his own person he went far towards realising his own picture of what human nature will become when moral evolution shall have done its perfect work, when men's highest "ambition will be to have had a share, even an utterly inappreciable and unknown share, in the making of man. . . While contemplating from the heights of thought that far-off life of the race never to be enjoyed by them, they will feel a calm pleasure in the consciousness of having aided the advance towards it."

Hence it was that notwithstanding his love for physical science, and the vast amount of useful work he has done in his endeavour to colligate all scientific facts and their history under one all-embracing conception, his deepest interests were always in the direction of ethical and political theory, and thus, as Mr. W. M. Salter justly says, "when warnings of failing health came to him (now some twenty odd years ago), he deliberately turned aside from work that would have been more in order to the more pressing task of bringing out at least the first part of his Principles of Morality, which was to be the crown and capstone of his published system, and for which all the rest was preparation."

Defective Moral Doctrine.

Opinions will differ as to how far Mr. Spencer's elaborate works furnish a satisfactory rationale of the origin and development of man's ethical ideas. He has certainly written much that will be of value to future students of ethics; but our impression is that there are vital elements in man's moral consciousness of which his experiential method can give no adequate account. When, for instance, we read in the Data of Ethics his attempt to explain the origin of the sentiment of moral obligation, he appears to us to be attempting the intrinsically impossible feat of extracting an absolute imperative out of super-refined sentiments of personal pleasure and pain. But these subjective experiences can never yield any objective divine authority. For such authority it is indispensable that there should be in our moral consciousness some consciousness of the presence and character of the self-existent and the Eternal.

The Absolute in Perception.

Curiously enough in Mr. Spencer's religious theory we have that very incoming of the Absolute into man's consciousness which is so much to be desiderated in his ethical theory. In Perception, he tells us, man has a vague consciousness of the presence and causality of the Absolute, and in this fact he finds a basis for religion. Would that he had clearly recognised the companion truth that in our Moral Judgments there is also a direct apprehension of the presence and self-revelation of the Absolute, for by so doing he would not only have brought his ethical theory into accord with the consciousness of mankind, but he would also, in recognising the divine authority of the moral ideal, have saved his religious theory from its barrenness, and would have found in the self-revelation of the Absolute in the individual not only the assurance that the Absolute exists, but also a sure basis for the progressive apprehension of the nature and essential character of the Eternal and Infinite One.

A Basis for Religion.

But, though Mr. Spencer's basis for religious belief is, in our view, neither distinct enough nor broad enough, it is nevertheless very real and solid, and we confidently maintain that Christianity and, indeed, all forms of religion owe no inconsiderable debt of gratitude to this intrepid thinker, who, in an age when scientific interests were becoming all-engrossing, and when it was the fashion to speak of metaphysics with scorn, dared to run counter to the shallow prejudices of his time and to declare, in the face of the dominant phænomenalism, the metaphysical and ontological truth that the eternal God is in a measure self-revealed in the perceptive consciousness of mankind. By this notable utterance Mr. Spencer rekindled the glow of religious faith in many minds, and that, too, in those very quarters where the professional theologian or preacher had little chance of a hearing. When this eminent thinker in his First Principles thus laid the basis for a genuine religious belief, he had, like so many others who "have builded better than they knew," no clear forecast of the grand and substantial mental structures which his disciples would rear on his foundations. The late John Fiske is, perhaps, the most prominent of the many Spencerians who have found in Mr. Spencer's writings a clue to the attainment of rational and satisfying Theistic faith. As Dr. Martineau clearly showed, when Mr. Spencer asserted a positive knowledge of the existence and activity of the Absolute, he effectually "broke the spell of relativity," and its consequent agnosticism, and opened the door to a real and progressive insight into the essential nature of God, and of His relations with rational spirits.

Positivist Criticism.

These grand implications in Mr. Spencer's momentous assertion of man's direct consciousness of the Absolute did not escape the sharp eyes of his eminent Positivist critic Mr. Frederic Harrison. In his memorable controversy with Mr. Spencer in 1884 he points out that this inscrutable existence which Mr. Spencer declares that science is obliged to postulate as unreached by its deepest analysis, stands to our general conception of things in substantially the same relation as does the creative power asserted by theology.

Ten years ago (he adds) I warned Mr. Spencer that to invoke the Unknowable and make it the basis of a Religion was to re-open the whole range of metaphysics; and the entire apparatus of Theology will follow through the breach. He has developed the Unknowable into an infinite and Eternal Energy by which all things are created and sustained, the All-Being, the Creative Power, and the other alternative "impossibilities of thought," which he once cast in the teeth of the older theologies. Naturally there is joy over one sinner that repenteth. The Christian World claims this as equivalent to the assertion that God is the mind and spirit of Universe, and says that the words might have been used by Butler and Paley.

The Immanent God.

We venture to think that the Christian World was not very happy in classing Mr. Spencer with Butler, and still less so in classing him with Paley, for the implications in Mr. Spencer's First Principles are far removed from the deistic conceptions of the eighteenth century, and are closely akin to that conception of God as immanent in the Cosmos, and incarnate in every rational soul, which is now inspiring many of the greatest preachers in both the Nonconformist and the Anglican Churches, and which bids fair, in the course of a generation or two, to turn, via Sabellianism, the whole of cultured orthodoxy into virtual Unitarianism. Were the Self-existent One simply an external personality, it would be difficult or impossible to conceive of His relation either to the evolving Cosmos or to each rational soul, but now as Mr. Spencer's First Principles imply and as our leading religious philosophers more explicitly enunciate, the spirit of man has an immediate and not merely an inferential acquaintance with Absolute Spirit; and, therefore, the vastness of the universe no longer presents any bar to a direct knowledge of the Father within, for the immanent Eternal is at once

> Centre and Soul of every sphere,
> Yet to each loving heart how near.

We have attempted an expression of our deep sense of indebtedness to Mr. Spencer for the aid which he has rendered towards a sound philosophy of religion, and it may be added that in the opinion of the present writer he has also done no little service in helping to overthrow the unsubstantial idealism which finds favour with so many academic teachers, and by insisting on the reality and rights of the individual he has exercised a most wholesome influence in resisting a strong tendency in many sociologists to transform the Christian conception of the individual soul's direct relation to the indwelling God into the very different conception of its complete dependence on and ultimate subordination to the Social Organism.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

AMERICAN UNITARIANS.

DR. ELIOT ON THE WORK OF THE ASSOCIATION.

At the recent National Conference of the American Unitarian Churches, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., gave an address on the work of the American Unitarian Association, of which he is President.

"Religious institutions," he said, "are valuable only as a means of public well-being. That is a commonplace, but it is a commonplace that is often forgotten. Many churches—I had nearly said most churches—appear to exist not as means of public well-being, but as ends in themselves. One of the many responsibilities laid upon the adherents of a free and spiritual Christianity is to prove that their churches exist to serve the cause of public righteousness. Your American Unitarian Association does not exist for itself, but is the appointed channel of your usefulness. It is the executive army of the free churches banded in this Conference. The three primary purposes of your Association are, to unify, to stimulate, and to create. Let me deal with these three functions in inverse order."

Send a Man, not Money.

Dr. Eliot then told of the work done in the matter of church extension and education, and proceeded to deal with the question of methods for stimulating the life in existing churches, and helping them in their difficulties. Grants to churches, he pointed out, were apt to be accepted as permanent assets, hindering rather than helping healthy development, and he urged the policy of giving money subsidies not to churches, but to men. "Your best investment," he said, "is in earnest, able, and self-forgetting ministers. Would it not be a salutary change if, whenever a sister church needed temporary aid, instead of a dole of a few hundred dollars carrying with it the seeds of permanent dependency, your directors could send at once a sensible and energetic man who could re-invigorate, upbuild, and restore, or, if decay seemed inevitable and already far advanced, so report, and permit that which was dead to receive decent burial? Dead churches, like other dead things, are pestilential. I submit these observations again to your kindly consideration."

"At the same time," he added, "we shall do well to remember that, if we fail, it will not be simply because of a poor system, but because of deficient zeal, not for want of better methods, but for want of deeper life."

Union in Liberty.

The concluding passage of Dr. Eliot's address we reproduce in full:—

"The third function of your Association is to unify. John Stuart Mill said that the test of a high civilisation is to be found in capacity for co-operation. Our problem is how to secure the advantages of unity without infringing upon individual liberty. If, on the one hand, our unity is simply a matter of submission to domination, or if, on the other hand, our liberty is simply a matter of self-will and lawlessness, then we are hasting to chaos. Unless we can combine these two elements in reasonable harmony, we shall continue to come together at our various denominational gatherings to criticise one another, to tinker at our inadequate machinery without bettering it, to pass resolutions and print them and promptly forget them, and to wonder why we cannot secure the success achieved by the great denominations; and, after some more decades of such futile discussion, we shall all go to the rubbish heap together—things for which the world has no further use. I am persuaded of better things. If we are right-minded and right-hearted, we shall be all joined in one judgment and purpose, baptized by one spirit into one body. Sharing the same inspiration, and walking in one light, we cannot fail to find the same way. We shall find union in liberty, union in which there shall be no monotony, but glorious variety; diversity of gift, but one spirit.

The Free Way of the Spirit.

Let no one suppose I hanker after ecclesiastical prestige, or infallibilities of statement, or military discipline and flaunting banners under which we may march in ordered phalanx to external success. I am not so false to the genius of our movement. To copy the methods and pursue the ambitions of the great ecclesiastical corporations, would simply be to doom to death all that gives us distinction. The special contribution which our communion of free churches is to make to the life of Christendom is something different from that of the great religious corporations. It is ours to keep clear the channels of communication between the human soul and God, so that whosoever will may take of the water of life freely. It is ours to demonstrate that the law of liberty is more fruitful and no less binding than any law of outward constraint.

Freedom and its Uses.

There have always been visible in our fellowship two healthy tendencies, the conservative and the progressive. Our discussions are no longer over matters of doctrine, but rather concern themselves with the aims and purposes of our associated life. The conservative lay stress on freedom, the progressive on the use of freedom. The one holds back because he fears encroachment on the liberties of the churches. He fears that fellowship may be a first step to authority. He opposes closer organisation because he is jealous of the autonomy won by such heroic struggle, and dreads lest organisation may prove to be a Trojan horse in which are concealed treacherous enemies. He looks with suspicion on the growing strength of the national societies, and wonders if they do not contain the seeds of prelacy and popery. The other declares, as it seems to me with reason and justice, that the battle for freedom and for the autonomy of the local church has been fought and won; that all that is implied in independency has been obtained and can by no possibility be lost save by our own folly and indifference; that the present duty is to make good use of our freedom, to lead on from liberty to unity, from freedom to brotherhood, from independence to efficiency.

United and Vigilant.

Reason enough is there still for vigilance. We must watch lest we forfeit any of the rights and privileges of our free churches. But that peril is remote in comparison with the peril that in our voluntary isolation we grow sterile. Why should we fetter our usefulness because of imaginary dangers? Why should the extension of the activities of the united churches abridge the liberties of any one church? How is our precious heritage of freedom to be preserved unless we unite to preserve it?

One of the wisest and noblest utterances ever made in America was the famous speech of John Winthrop in 1645, defining true liberty—an address worthy to rank with Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg and Washington's farewell address. "There are two kinds of liberty," he said, "one is the liberty common to man and beast alike, which is incompatible with government and cannot endure restraint. This liberty is the enemy of truth and peace. It is not liberty: it is licence. The other kind of liberty I call civil or federal. It may also be termed moral in reference to the covenant between God and man in the moral law, and to the covenants and constitutions among men themselves. This liberty is the proper end and object of authority, and cannot exist without it. It is a liberty to do that which is good, just, and honest. It is of the same kind of liberty wherewith Christ has made us free."

MORE LIGHT WANTED.

SIR,—As I have been asked to throw "more light" upon the words I spoke at one of the conferences lately held in Manchester, may I be allowed to explain that my plea was for greater sincerity of language, a plea which is so ably put forward by Mr. T. J. Hardy, in his Confession of Heresy.

We often deplore the action of other people, who strain the meaning of words, in order to express an attitude of mind which is quite different from that for which the word naturally stands; but we are apt to overlook the fact that we sometimes fall into the same error; an error which, in both cases, is due to an earnest, though, in my opinion, mistaken belief that the cause of religion and of reverence will suffer, unless these outgrown symbols of the past are retained; although, in order to use them, their whole former meaning has to be altered, if not perverted. And, as instances, I mentioned the words Incarnation, Atonement, Trinity.

The mention of the Trinity brought to my mind the passage,

> The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
> And God fulfils himself in many ways, and I felt that when the old order had changed for us; when, not only in three, but in many ways, we see God fulfilling or manifesting Himself (using that word in its extended, dictionary meaning, and not in its narrower root-sense), then it will tend towards confusion of judgment, both to speaker and hearers, if the newer thought is enshrined in the old form. But this opinion can have no bearing in the case of Mr. Capleton, as it is evident from his letter that, to him, the old order has not changed, although it may be that one Trinity has been substituted for another.

So far as metaphysical speculations are concerned, I do not think they are very profitable subjects for discussion; nor do I believe, if Jesus had spoken of the Heavenly Father in such terms as those expressed in last week's letter, that the "common people" would have "heard him gladly!"

Surely the underlying thought of that passage—which sets forth as a trinity the principle of life, the revealer of mankind in general, and the revealer of Jesus in particular—may be found, clothed in greater simplicity, truth, and beauty in Paul's words, "Ye are the temple of God." It is in the realms of poetry and imagination that we can best find a fitting symbol of The One, The Supreme; and here we catch a glimpse of the vision! If the Divine Spirit dwells within, then the light should be able to shine through the windows of every individual soul; though the brightness of the rays which are spread abroad on the earth, illuminating and blessing all upon whom they fall, will be greater or less, according to the size of those windows, and according to the state of cleanliness and purity in which they are kept.

MARIAN PRITCHARD.

FROM BRUSSELS.

SIR,—I have great pleasure in announcing to our Unitarian friends in England that the litigation which has been troubling us for nine years and a half has at last come to an end. The town of Brussels has decided not to carry its two last actions up to the Court of Cassation. It is true that in pleading before the Court of Appeal last July, the leading counsel for the town threatened to force a fourth action upon us. But the consent of the Town Council to the re-opening of the question seems, to say the least, very doubtful.

This successful consummation gives us all, of course, great satisfaction. We are very grateful to our two counsel, Messrs. Anspach and Pécher, who have most disinterestedly fought the battles of the church to which they belong; but it is easy to understand that the close of these long and laborious proceedings is a relief to them. The minister has recovered a balance of £108 12s. due to him on his salary for the years 1897, 1899, and 1902. The church has entered into possession of an invested capital of about £700 and has no longer to provide the minister with house rent, as he will now receive from the town the annual indemnity of £48 which has been the object of the protracted contest.

We again present the expression of our deep gratitude to all our friends who have enabled us to exist through this ordeal. But we hope they will not abandon us now they have helped us out of one difficulty, for there are others that remain. An urgent measure, in view of greater success, would be the transfer of our services to a proper place of worship, not ornamented as the present hall is with a large picture of a female dancer. And then we would need to extend our propagandism by lectures in various places, by the distribution of religious literature, &c. If we attempted all that would be necessary, our little reserve would soon vanish. But I feel sure that when we can speak of really favourable openings, our English friends will allow us to appeal anew to their brotherly kindness.

A fresh and valuable proof of the interest taken by English Unitarians in our work has been offered us by Mr. Carpenter, who has generously volunteered to come and lecture here in French on the 12th and 14th January. We have secured for the occasion a good-sized hall, and we hope to gather an audience which may recompense Mr. Carpenter in some measure for all the trouble he is taking, and enable him to help us largely by giving a new impetus to our work.

LONDON THEATRE SERVICES.

SIR,—The Committee of the London District Unitarian Society desire to thank through your columns the numerous friends who have aided as stewards, canvassers, and members of the choir, to render the services recently held at the Carlton Theatre, Greenwich, and the Grand Theatre, Islington, so successful.

The thanks of London Unitarians are also due to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the clear-sighted generosity which has supplied the funds to enable the representative Unitarian Society of London to make so effective a presentation of our views in the Metropolis. How successful the organisation was, and how effective the appeal made has been, is amply shown by the rapid increase in the numbers attending the services. The numbers at Islington were as nearly as we can estimate, 460, 675, 925, and 1,450 on the successive Sundays.

The cordial support given in the work by the congregations of Unity Church, Islington, Hampstead, Highgate, Kentish Town, George's-row Mission, Newington-green, and Essex Church also deserves our recognition. We also had the assistance of some fourteen members of the Laymen's Club. On behalf of the Committee,

ALFRED WILSON,
Chairman Popular Services Sub-Committee;
E. HAROLD CLENNELL,
Secretary, L.D.U.S.

"LE MONACHISME: ses origines païennes, ses erreurs fondamentales, son influence néfaste sur la religion, la morale et la société," is the title of a new book of four hundred pages by the Rev. J. Hocart, of Brussels, just published by Fischbacher, of Paris (4 francs). His book, which we reserve for fuller notice, M. Hocart acknowledges in the preface, is a polemic, not a work of erudition, directed against the religious orders, in which he sees one of the greatest obstacles to religious, moral, civil, and political progress.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESS IN SCOTLAND.

"YOU ARE SLOW."

WHEN William McQuaker, in his last will and testament, expressed his opinion that "Unitarian Christianity would probably progress slowly in Scotland for a considerable time to come," he showed a close and true understanding of the conditions of theological thought in this country. He noted accurately the methods of the theological training of the young, and judged shrewdly the cast of mind of the slow Scot.

An instance of the way in which Unitarianism was viewed by a northern business man of a thoughtful type came under my notice lately, and as it helps to explain the gauge of Mr. McQuaker, I refer to it here. I had been disappointed in an audience for a McQuaker lecture in a country town, and was spending the evening irksomely with a friend, when I spied, among the books indicative of a wide literary taste, a thick volume entitled "Some Notes, Personal and Public." I opened the book eagerly, for I had known the author; he was the Aberdeen agent for a well-known newspaper, and prospered as such, so that he left a sum twice as large as that bequeathed by Mr. McQuaker.

He often expressed to me his sympathy with Unitarian views, and told me that, when from home he always went to service in a Unitarian chapel. I never saw him in ours here, but he usually gave me a donation when I begged for any of our schemes. He once said to me, "I can go as far as Channing, but I halt with him." On his own account he published some of Channing's essays.

In his "Notes" he devotes a chapter to Unitarianism which has more than a local interest. He heard the sermons of the Rev. Archibald Macdonald, in October, 1838, which virtually started the Church here. He states that while he admired the eloquence of the preacher, he retained unchanged the impression of Jesus which his use of Matthew's Gospel as a text book, when learning to read, made on his mind, "a sense of the greatness, perfect goodness, and grandeur of the life and teachings of Jesus, which has made it through life impossible for me to dispute about what is called His Divinity."

However, he continued to attend Unitarian preaching, and describes the Rev. George Harris graphically. He says: "Mr. Harris was a born orator, and when addressing an audience, whether indoor or outdoor, exerted an almost irresistible influence. It was his eloquence, in my opinion, that led to the formation of the Unitarian Church in Aberdeen." Taking a wider survey, he says: "If the Unitarians have scored a theological victory in Scotland, it has been on the point of eternal punishment."

But he credits the movement with an influence which led to increased earnestness about religious matters among the youth of Aberdeen." He gives a very interesting reminiscence of Dr. Martineau's preaching in our church on the occasion of the meeting of the British Association for the advancement of Science, in 1859. He states that Professor Blackie, who was present, waved his straw hat in the passage, and exclaimed, "There's not another preacher in the whole English pulpit could have done that."

Winding up his impressions, this philosopher of seventy-five winters says:—"My notion is that the dogma contained in all the formulas of Christendom has played a necessary part in the evolution of religious thought, and that, as yet, nothing equal to it as a complete whole has come to take its place. These old beliefs, modified from time to time, will continue to furnish hope, aspiration, consolation, and guidance to all earnest seekers after truth."

Catching the political passion of his time, the writer of these notes became a Chartist lecturer, but when I first knew him his fervour was spent, any pith that he had being put into journalism.

It is fifteen years since Wm. McQuaker died, and Wm. Lindsay was buried five years ago. Even in the shorter period, much modification of theological opinion has been effected. Mr. McQuaker, in his optimistic way, expressed his belief that "Unitarian principles will yet be widely accepted in Scotland." His more doubtful northern contemporary foresaw "modifications" of orthodoxy, and we may now perceive that progress is to be expected by modifications which will be inward.

The thought of the sects will change, but they will retain their names, places, and power. Unitarian principles will be widely accepted, but Unitarian churches will not multiply.

Lindsay tells us in his notes that it was his reading of the Gospel according to Matthew that gave him his early impression of Jesus. That declaration indicates the line of our work; we have to shed a scientific light upon the Bible. The Creed is virtually shelved. Critical interest is focussed on the Bible. But there is difficulty in interesting the people in Biblical criticism. If I may judge by my own experience as a lecturer in various parts of the country, I should say there is little, if any, interest regarding Biblical subjects. When I announce a lecture relative to the Bible, I get forty to come; but when I speak of "Robert Elsmere," "God and my Neighbour," or any notable book, I get three times the number, though I say almost the same thing in all cases.

There is an ignorant sentiment prevalent regarding the Bible. A vague sacredness wraps it from examination. And ministers deliberately discount the effect of Biblical criticism on the dogmas in the Standards. They tell the people that not one of the vital doctrines has been in any way seriously affected by such criticism. So the people hold to the Authorised Version and the traditional conception of the Bible. They are actually in dense ignorance regarding the findings of the critics, and have none of the critics' inquisitiveness.

There has not been in this generation a religious or other rousing and educative movement like the Chartist or Morrisonian agitations which were so powerful sixty years ago. The same sort of men are not bred now. The character of the mind has changed. The intellectual concerns are different. Theology evokes little or no interest. The young Scot is either Agnostic or unconcerned. The pressure of the age is materialistic. All the churches are suffering from the materialism; ours, being openest, suffer most. Most of the sects are making frantic efforts to get hold of the people. Orchestras are following organs in Free churches, and "the minister can hardly be seen for the fiddles."

There are sharp symptoms of clerical reaction from the Confession of Faith in the Established Church, but still the parsons seem more concerned for the endowment of their pulpits than for the escape from oppressive dogmatic authority. A typical instance of ecclesiastical dealing with the results of Biblical criticism occurred recently at a meeting of the Established Presbytery of Dundee. A committee which reported on "The Dearth of Divinity Students," stated as a primal cause "the present fluidity of belief, especially in reference to the Bible as an authoritative revelation, and the consequent apathy and indifference of the people to the Church." But while six remedies were proposed with regard to other causes, no suggestion was made on the "fluidity of belief" cause.

Dealing with the same complaint (scarcity of divinity students), Professor Cooper, of Glasgow, in a paper read before the Synod of Lothian and Tweeddale, gave as a principal cause, "the prevailing unsettlement of religious belief." He blamed the clergy for the unsettlement, and said "they had not endeavoured to reassure the people, but were themselves touched with the unbelieving criticism, much of which was mere wilfulness, and no little part of a cloak to cover unbelief." The Rev. Dr. Glasse strongly objected to the imputation of mean motives to the liberal clergy, and defended the critics amid "loud applause."

A very notable communication by the Rev. Alex. Robinson, Congregational Church, Crieff, recently appeared in a Glasgow newspaper. Mr. Robinson was deposed from the ministry of the Established Church in 1896 for the publication of a critical work entitled, "The Saviour in the Newer Light." He called attention to the new attitude to the Confession indicated by the declaration of the Church of Scotland in the last General Assembly, and declared his intention to move for the revision of the judgment by which he was deposed; claiming, meanwhile, that there had been shown by the declaration of the Assembly and the speeches connected with it, the clamant need of a particular theological advance.

On the same lines Dr. Curtis, the new professor of systematic theology in Aberdeen University, in his inaugural lecture this month, spoke out thus:—

> Within their own national church in the present year, the venerable Confession that had stood so long as a symbol binding Presbyterians together, had had authoritative emphasis laid upon its more tolerant and progressive clauses, with what might be described as unanimous recognition by the General Assembly of the fact, long tacitly assured, that its doctrine in detail can no longer be claimed to represent the spontaneous beliefs of the great majority of our teachers and preachers. Therefore, he came to Aberdeen with no deep-seated fears about the future of religion. He was not come to lead within those precincts two separate lives, a religious and a scientific. In his soul he was conscious of no conflict between reason and religion. Reason might war with error in him; it might break up his superstitions into their constituents of erroneous and truth-embodying beliefs; the former it annihilated, the latter it did homage to, and these were his religious guides and solaces.

So the modification goes on, and neither so slowly nor so unadmittedly as Mr. McQuaker feared. Although the Confession of Faith still has legal force in the Presbyterian Churches, it is virtually repudiated. Temporising and compromise prevail, and the sound of the preacher is uncertain.

Dr. Torrey, in his revival work at Dundee, bitterly expressed the difficulty experienced by him in making converts there and at Aberdeen. He said, "You are slow. The trouble with you Scots is not that you are not sure, but that you do not act after you are sure." He denounced the Higher Criticism, and declared that "if there is not a devil and a hell there ought to be."

The fact is, Scotland is slower to-day in taking to evangelism of Dr. Torrey's sort than in taking to the literature of the advanced theologians. But while Scotland will not yet confess to Unitarianism, her Confession (were she to make a new one) would not be Calvinistic. We need not fret over or insist on our label. It is the spirit that quickeneth, and whatever form the re-constructed theology of Scotland may take, it will be Unitarian in spirit.

The type of man that took to our cause in the last generation was strongly shown in William Freeland, poet and journalist, who died last month. He was a confirmed Unitarian, and had a long quiet connection with the Saint Vincent-street congregation, Glasgow. But though strong-minded, he was unobtrusive, and held that religion was a private matter. There are thousands like him. They shrink from the exercise of an influence which would make family or social friction, and so they live practically inert so far as church life is concerned. We want more of the confessing spirit. Our unaggressive meekness prevents our inheritance of leadership and even of proper footing.

The upholding of our cause in Scotland becomes increasingly difficult. The current theological scorn and the lower religious concern are against us. The few who are fervent go into other spheres of work. Indeed, the conditions of our existence have so changed recently that it is necessary to present a new front, and re-adapt our energies. The tactics that suited the day of Harris are utterly useless now. It is unfortunate that our churches are so far apart and poor. We cannot meet for stimulation, and have to pay a heavy penalty for our isolation. But the work is maintained with courage. All our congregations struggle against great odds. With some, there is hardly any more than holding fast what they have, though that is a feat to be admired. With others, there is growth, which, though slow, is secure.

Other churches have heard a call to outward movement, and are endeavouring to get at the people in the open. I am persuaded that if we were to go out with fervour to present a simple Gospel, the common people would listen gladly. I think it would be good for us to leave our churches and indoor machinery for a while, and take to the highways and by-ways with an adapted message. Just as there is in medicine a reversion to open-air treatment, there seems to be a call that way in religion. The conscience of Scotland is out of the Church, and if we desire to get at it and influence it, we will have to follow it in its resort.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant writes:—"I venture once again to ask permission to appeal in your columns in aid of my Poor's Purse. The contributions received at this season are required to meet the needs of the year 1904, in addition to the Christmas gifts. This district is the poorest in the whole of London and there is at the present time much sickness and distress; moreover the outlook for the near future as regards employment is a very gloomy one. A generous response is urgently solicited. Contributions of money, clothing, books, toys, &c., will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E."

London: George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—"Will you allow me to appeal to kind friends of the poor at this season of the year? As Missionary I am in need of money for the Poor's Purse, on which there are just now unfortunately many claims, and I appeal, therefore, to new as well as old friends. I should be glad also to receive new or cast-off clothing, boots, &c., as well as toys and books for children's prizes. For the library and reading-room, too, books and periodicals (not necessarily new) would always be welcome. Will kind friends assist me in these ways, especially as the needs are both urgent and great. Parcels may be sent to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C., and letters either to the same address or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, London, N."

London: Rhyl-street Mission.—Dr. Read, who is now in charge of the Mission, writes:—"The Poor's Purse, which was handed on to me by my predecessor, Mr. Wilson, is now exhausted, and I shall be glad to receive from the friends of the Mission donations, both for the Poor's Purse and the Christmas fund, and also gifts of new or cast-off clothing, as early as possible. Parcels may be sent to the Domestic Mission, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W.; and letters either to the same address or to 22, Willoughby-road, Hampstead, N.W."

Manchester Domestic Mission, Willert-street.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop writes:—"May I, as in former years, appeal to our friends for much-needed help? We want to give a tea to our upwards of 500 scholars on Christmas Day, also a toy or a warm garment from a Christmas tree, and for this purpose toys and garments would be gladly received. But especially do we appeal on behalf of the Poor's Purse, as shortness of employment throughout the year is now causing much more than usual privation in our district. Cast-off clothing, especially women's, there is great need of." Mr. Bishop should be addressed at the Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester.

Aberdare.—The Old Meeting mourns the death, at the early age of fifty, of Mr. Joseph Jenkins, whose family for five generations had been identified with the congregation, and for three generations before that with the chapel at Cefncoed. Mr. Jenkins was for many years teacher, secretary, and then superintendent of the school, and also secretary of the church and a trustee, often officiating in the absence of the minister. Some ten years ago Mr. Jenkins removed to the Rhondda, where he was helpful to Dr. Griffiths in his work at Pontypridd, and also at Pentre and Clydach Vale. It was at Bournemouth, on November 28, that Mr. Jenkins died, of rapid consumption. The funeral was at Aberdare Cemetery, the service being conducted by the Revs. D. Rees and R. J. Jones.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—A cordial welcome was given to the Rev. J. Worsley Austin at a meeting on Wednesday week, over which Mr. P. W. Crosskey, chairman of the Vestry Committee, presided. Several addresses of welcome were given, the speakers including the Right Hon. William Kenrick, M.P., and Mr. Alfred Wigley, who represented the Old Meeting Church. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, who joined in the welcome, recalled the memories of his own early connection with Birmingham, as a young man coming straight from college, and his gratitude to the men who gave him so hearty a reception. Dawson and Dale, he said, were great men, and were among those who lifted the tone of public life in that great city. Dr. Crosskey was one of those who, by his wonderful work on the School Board, had left a mark that would never be forgotten in the history of Birmingham. Mr. Austin, he said, had come from a very successful ministry in America. He had the strongest conviction that they had done right in choosing him as their pastor. In reply, Mr. Austin said that when he left his parish beyond the seas he longed above all things that his path would lead him into one of the busy, bustling centres of English commercial life. He was interested in the problems which city life presented, social, political, and educational, and if he had been asked which centre he would like to be in he would have said: "If possible, Birmingham."

Birmingham, Newhall Hill.—A vigorous effort to obtain new support for this church has met with such success that at a special meeting of the congregation held on Monday evening a resolution was unanimously passed instructing the committee to take immediate steps to secure the services of a settled minister.

Brighton.—The Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., has concluded a course of three lectures on "The Story of the New Testament," at Christ Church, New-road. The lectures were listened to with much interest by audiences including some well-known members of other churches in the town. In his first lecture Mr. Hargrove spoke of the universal distribution of the New Testament, and described the origin of the Canon. "Our New Testament," he said, "is the record which contains Jesus Christ. For itself it makes no claim to be infallible, inspired, Holy Scripture, the Word of God. But Jesus is in it—Jesus the fount of that Christian life and power which abide in the world a beneficent force to-day. As such it will remain, an inestimable treasure to mankind, no matter what may be the conclusion of modern criticism as to its writings and compositions." The subsequent lectures dealt with the Synoptic Gospels, pointing out their common groundwork and individual details; and, lastly, the Fourth Gospel. A clear case was made out for the late origin of this work, which, while it is distinctly unhistorical, fully merits the description of it given by Clement of Alexandria, viz., "The Spiritual Gospel."

Cardiff.—The Induction of the Rev. W. Whitaker as minister of the West Grove Church took place this week. On Sunday morning the Rev. Henry Gow preached a special sermon on the Ideal of the Christian Ministry, in the afternoon Mr. Gow and Mr. Whitaker gave addresses at a Children's Service, and in the evening Mr. Whitaker preached to a crowded congregation. On Monday evening a congregational tea was followed by a most successful welcome meeting, when Mr. G. Carslake Thompson took the chair, and addresses were given by the Revs. H. Gow, J. H. Wetherall, Dr. Warschauer, R. J. Jones, G. W. Lamport (a clergyman of the Church of England), Mr. L. N. Williams, Mr. J. Glenelg Grant, and Mr. Whitaker responded to the cordial welcome he received. The apologies for absence included letters from several Nonconformist ministers of the town, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, J. Harwood, and others.

Chatham (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of the Hamond Hill Church, in succession to the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock.

Clifton.—During November a series of Wednesday evening services has been conducted by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer at 6, Broad-street, Staple Hill, one of the rapidly growing outer districts of Bristol. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association made a grant towards the expenses, and much interest has been awakened. The services, which have been well attended, are being continued during the present month.

Darlington.—On Temperance Sunday a resolution was unanimously passed by the congregation assembled in the Unitarian church, protesting "against the reactionary legislation which the present Government proposes to introduce next season, by which the existing discretionary power of the magistrates would be curtailed."

Derby (Appointment).—The Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, of Guildford, has accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation from the congregation of the Friar Gate Chapel to become their minister in succession to the Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S.

Devonport.—On Sunday, November 29, the popular services in the theatre were continued, the Rev. Professor Weatherall being the preacher. After dealing with some of the misconceptions of the meaning of Unitarianism, Professor Weatherall referred to an article in the British Weekly under the heading, "The Bible in Tatters," which he described as six columns of hysterics, protesting against the "Encyclopædia Biblica," and proceeded to show that religion had nothing to fear from Biblical criticism. The address, which was not only a defence of the higher criticism, but also an eloquent plea for the religion of the heart that was untouched by criticism, was listened to with great attention. The third of the series of services was held on Sunday, December 6, when the Rev. James C. Street was the preacher. Mr. Street's subject was "The Gospel for the Twentieth Century," and his address was instinct with the freshness, fervour, and faith which characterise all his utterances. The attendance at these services has not risen above 200, but there has always been the closest attention and marked interest shown. On the 6th the church celebrated its anniversary, the minister, the Rev. G. L. Phelps, preaching in the morning, and the Rev. J. C. Street at night. The choir rendered special anthems during the evening service, which was very well attended.

Dunmurry.—A memorial window to two life-long members of the congregation has been placed in the First Presbyterian Church. The inscription is as follows:—"In memory of John Wellington Stouppe M'Cance, born 17th July, 1816, died 27th July, 1863; and Henry Jones M'Cance, born 23rd May, 1829; died 24th October, 1900. Erected by their sister, the last survivor of the family, by other members of this congregation, and friends." The window, which is of a character unique in the north of Ireland, shows no figures, but a landscape, into which some local features have been introduced.

Heaton Moor.—During the present winter the Rev. Priestley Prime is giving a series of sermons on Sunday evenings on "Channing, Emerson, and Martineau," the first being delivered on November 29. The newly formed Literary and Social Society has held, besides pleasant social evenings, several interesting discussions on important questions. The subject of "England's Poor," introduced by the secretary at the last meeting, was thought so important and interesting, that it was resolved to continue the consideration of the subject on a future evening.

Horsham.—The congregation have to mourn the loss of Mr. Humphrey Nash, who for over thirty years had filled the office of treasurer, and died on November 1, while on a voyage to Australia. Born in 1832, he was educated by Mr. Sadler and Mr. Ashdowne, both ministers of the church. He married the daughter of the latter, and from their early married home at Capel often used to drive in with a wagonette full of his young folks. Settling in Horsham, he took an active interest in various affairs in the town. Constantly helpful in many ways he took special pleasure in the recitation of poetry, and he was also ready to supply the pulpit in case of need, either at Horsham or Billingshurst. Mr. Nash was looking forward to seeing his eldest son and grandchildren in Australia, but hoped to return to his old church. A friend, writing of him, recalls the words of an elder Humphrey: "Never fear, Heaven is as near by sea as 'tis by land."

Ipswich.—The annual meeting and congregational tea was held on Nov. 27, Mr. F. Robinson (of Stowmarket) occupying the chair. The secretary reported a good year's work. The congregation had increased, and fifteen new subscribers were added to the list. The Young People's Guild, numbering 73, has proved a great success in organising pleasant evenings, lectures, art classes, as a result of which the schoolroom has been decorated by members of the chapel, through the untiring efforts of the minister, Rev. Lucking Tavener.

Leigh.—The monthly fellowship meeting of the N. and E. Lancashire Mission, held last Saturday at Leigh, was a great success. Mr. Thomas Harwood, Revs. R. T. Herford, T. P. Spedding, and J. J. Shaw, and others, represented the Mission, and were received early in the afternoon by the Rev. R. S. Redfern, minister of the church. At the afternoon service an uplifting sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and after tea a largely attended public meeting was held, friends from as far away as Burnley and Rossendale being present. Alderman Pennington took the chair, and addresses were given by Mr. Thomas Harwood, Revs. T. P. Spedding, and J. J. Shaw, and the meeting closed in good time with the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. R. S. Redfern.

London: Essex Church. — To-morrow (Sunday) evening "The Messiah" will be rendered by an augmented choir. Madam Carrie Blackwell and Miss Minnie Chamberlain will sing the soprano and contralto solos.

London: Forest Gate.—The sale of work held last week passed off successfully, and the auxiliary fund is a gainer by the sum of £50. Mr. John Harrison proved a generous supporter, and his opening speech heartened everybody. The Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, Joseph Wicksteed, and John Ellis assisted, while Mr. Clennell and Mrs. Clennell may be said to have represented kind helpers from other districts who could not be personally present. The tastefully arranged stalls were well patronised, and the musical co-operation of Miss Butcher and other friends was much appreciated. Donations were received from several well-tried friends, and goods were sent from various parts of the country.

London: George's-row.—On Sunday afternoon last the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed conducted a special service for children, and on the subject of David and Goliath thoroughly interested all who heard him.

London: Highgate.—The two days' bazaar arranged with the object of clearing off the debt still existing on the new Spears Memorial Buildings was held on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. The new rooms were found very useful for the various demands of a bazaar, and were all occupied to their fullest extent. The proceedings were opened on Wednesday by Lady Durning Lawrence, who, after being introduced by the treasurer, spoke some very kind and encouraging words to the assembled stallholders and friends, expressing the great pleasure it ever afforded her to assist in any work in connection with Highgate Church, and her special pleasure in helping to complete a task initiated by Mr. Spears. The Rev. R. H. Greaves then spoke, assuring Lady Durning Lawrence that the pleasure was mutual, and asking her acceptance of a silk chatelaine bag as a memento of the occasion. A similar proceeding took place on Thursday, Mrs. Wm. A. Sharpe kindly officiating as opener. Stalls were provided by the congregation, Channing House School, and the Sunday-school, whilst friends from Walthamstow also most kindly furnished a small stall as a token of their sympathy and their desire to help. Business was actively carried on during both days, whilst a variety of side shows and a succession of short and bright entertainments added both to the funds and to the enjoyment of the company. The refreshment arrangements were most efficiently managed by the Misses Spears and Cornish. The receipts from all sources amounted to £184 5s. 9d., or a net result of about £160. This leaves a balance of £700 still required to clear off the debt.

Loughborough (Resignation).—The Rev. Peter Dean, under medical advice, has resigned the pulpit of the Victoria-street Church, and will conclude his ministry in February next.

Moneyrea.—A very successful congregational soirée was held on Friday evening, Dec. 4. Over 300 sat down to tea in the school-room, and the Rev. R. Lyttle afterwards presided in the meeting-house over a large audience, when addresses were given by the Right Hon. James Andrews, D.L., and the Revs. D. Walmsley, W. H. Drummond, and T. Dunkerley. Mr. Andrews reviewed the history of the Irish land movement for the past thirty years, and expressed the hope that the recent Land Purchase Bill, which had crowned the efforts of land reformers for the past half-century, would fulfil the high hopes which he entertained as to the efficacy of its provisions to establish occupying ownership in Ireland. He advised the landlords not to demand exorbitant prices, and he advised the tenants not to stand back from a bargain for the sake of a year's purchase. The present generous bonus might not always be as available as at present. Should a remnant of landlords, after a few years, utterly refuse to do their share in settling the Irish land question on fair and reasonable terms, he admitted that the application of the principle of compulsion would be necessary, and in that case there would be reason in the demand to have it applied; and he for one would not hold back from taking that attitude, should it be impossible to settle the question without it. Several friends contributed songs and instrumental music, and an inclusive vote of thanks brought the meeting to a close.

Scarborough. — On Tuesday, December 8, the last of a series of six lectures on "The Gospel According to St. John" was delivered by the Rev. Charles Hargrove. These lectures have been given weekly in the Mechanics' Institute, as part of the scheme of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for promoting more extensive propagandist work. The attendance at the commencement of the course was very fair, including a number of strangers to the Unitarian congregagation, and though the numbers thinned towards the end, the result, as far as it is possible to estimate from figures, cannot be considered unsatisfactory for a town of the size and character of Scarborough.

Shepton Mallet (Resignation).—The Rev. Lindsey T. Badcock has resigned the pulpit of Canal-street Chapel, and will close his ten years' ministry there in March.

Sunderland.—A lecture on "Is Jesus Christ God?" having been delivered at St. Thomas Church (in connection with the Sunday Afternoon Addresses to Working Men) by the Rev. Dr. Gee, of Durham University, the Rev. F. Wood gave two Sunday evening sermons in reply. In the first, he argued that Dr. Gee's claim that Jesus was the greatest personalty the world had ever known would be difficult to establish, and, if admitted, would not prove that Jesus was God. In the second, he stated and illustrated the difficulties Unitarians feel in regard to the alleged dual nature of Christ. On Sunday evening, Nov. 22, Mr. Wood lectured before the Sunderland Jewish Social Club on "The Jewish People and the Peace Movement."

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.—The bazaar, of which the Rev. Charles Hargrove wrote in last week's INQUIRER, was opened on the first day by Sir James Kitson, Bart., M.P., the Lord Mayor of Leeds presiding. The opener on the second day was Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. C. Hargrove (in the regretted absence of Mr. Grosvenor Talbot) taking the chair; and on the concluding day Mr. John Ward, the ex-Lord Mayor, the Rev. C. J. Street in the chair. The three days' takings amounted to £1,200, which, with donations received, secures £4,000 for the work of the Union.

THE effective life and the receptive life are one. No sweep of aim that does some work for God, but harvests also some more of the truth of God and sweeps it into the treasury of the life.—Phillips Brooks.

ABOUT nine hundred cripples are known to the four Manchester organisations which look to their care. It is believed that there is a much larger number, especially as but a small proportion of these are adults. The Cripples' Aid Federation of Manchester and Salford has been formed to enable workers to confer together, to co-operate in extension of the work to cover the whole ground, and to prevent overlapping. The Federation proposes also to secure further medical and surgical aid, to establish an employment bureau, take measures for better educational management, and provide a home for adult cripples. A crowded meeting called by the Federation was held on December 3 in the Lord Mayor's Parlour, when Mrs. Humphry Ward, who has taken so important a part in similar work in London, was the principal speaker, and the subsequent speakers included Miss Dendy and several doctors.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's testimony that the frequent representation in fiction of the cripple as a morally as well as physically deformed person was entirely false, was received with a murmur of assent from those who sat near her who were the actual workers among these sufferers. Mrs. Ward doubted whether the establishment of an Adult Cripples' Home would do all that was expected of it, though it ought to be tried. The good influence of the cripple in the home and the love and companionship of dear ones are certainly as important factors in their lives as in those of most people; and, except for special treatment or for those who have no friends to care for them, the Cripples' Home may not be the best place. Miss Dendy referred to some touching cases of the care and considerateness of other children in day-schools for the deformed, and was not altogether in favour of special schools for cripples excepting for such as were quite unfit for the ordinary school course.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

TO-MORROW is Peace Sunday, of which we speak in our leading article. Special intercession is asked for on behalf of the sufferers in Macedonia. Friends who are not present in any church where collections are made for this purpose, should send their contributions to the Macedonian Relief Committee, 116, Victoria-street, Westminster; or, if they prefer it, to the Society of Friends' Macedonian Relief Committee, Devonshire House, Bishopsgate-street Without, E.C.

AT Weimar this week (Friday, December 18), the centenary of Herder's death has been celebrated. The friend of Goethe, he was for more than a quarter of a century a commanding and awakening power in literature and in the religious life of that brilliant period. One of his most characteristic works was on "The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," the most popular, perhaps, his translation of the "Cid." He was an ardent student of ancient literatures, and foreshadowed modern ideas of history and human evolution. On his grave at Weimar is inscribed his favourite motto: "Light, Love, Life."

THERE seems at last to be real hope for Macedonia. General Tzontcheff, the Macedonian insurgent leader, had an interview on Tuesday with M. Delcassé, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, and believes that the Powers are about to impose on the Sultan a settlement on the Cretan model, i.e., the establishment of a governor responsible to the Powers, and only owing nominal allegiance to the Porte. The Paris correspondent of the Daily News has information to the same effect from other sources. While in Vienna, General Tzontcheff told Mr. Macdonald—

We were informed of a scheme for solving the Macedonian question on the Cretan precedent. We were assured that its public announcement would be made in a week or two. But we thought the news too good to be true. To-day I am less sceptical.

Russia herself is said to have taken the the step of proposing this solution, prompted, no doubt, by M. Delcassé himself. That she did so rather through "alarm at the prospect of an Austrian occupation of Macedonian territory west of the Vardar, with access to Salonika," than through humanitarian motives, does not affect the value of the move for Macedonia. It has been clear from the first that the jealousies which prevented the application of the Cretan plan were as short-sighted as discreditable. If this is at last being realised, we are on the high road to a settlement.

IT is good news also to learn from M. Gologanoff, the member of the Macedonian Committee who is accompanying General Tzontcheff, that "the old jealousy between the Servians and their Bulgarian neighbours may now be regarded as extinct." Mr. Macdonald himself recalls how the leader of the Radical-Liberals in Servia told him in Belgrade last June that this extinction would follow as an effect of the Macedonian insurrection.

He saw that in taking up the cause of the Macedonians the Bulgarians were not influenced by territorial ambitions, but by humanity and by natural sympathy with a people of the same race and speech as themselves. If war breaks out next spring, Servia may give her Bulgarian neighbours effectual help.

If Servia believes in the disinterestedness of Bulgaria surely Europe may.

ANY hope of help from the Archbishop of Canterbury in securing an equitable settlement of the education question which his recent proposal for a conference may have aroused is finally destroyed by the extraordinary manifesto he published on Tuesday:—

We believe [he says] that the new legislation, while certainly capable of amendment in detail, is sound and fair in principle. . . . . Therefore we support it and resolve to persevere in its defence.

He complains of "misrepresentations" respecting the provisions of the new legislation, and dwells on the necessity for repeated explanations to the public as to "what were the conditions of the problem which had to be solved by whatever Government might have been in office, and what are the changes actually brought about by recent legislation."

THE "condition of the problem" on which the Archbishop lays most emphasis is the fact that in spite of voluntary subscriptions, which he puts down from all sources and for all purposes at a million a year, "it has been found practically impossible, without some rearrangement of the incidence of the burden, to keep the voluntary schools in equipment and staff fully abreast of the Board schools." The Archbishop assumes that this fact laid upon "whatever Government might have been in office," the obligation of finding for the school managers the wherewithal to provide the equipment and staff they lacked. He forgets the alternative already provided by the Act of 1870—the surrender of this burden by the managers into the hands of popularly elected boards.

HAVING seized, by Anglican votes in both Houses of Parliament, without any mandate from the country, the same rate aid for their schools as is enjoyed by the schools of the people, the Archbishop and his friends now treat as an outrage the demand that schools so supported shall be no longer used for the propagation of the views of a sect.

We Churchmen [he says] have inherited a great trust in the possession of schools the trust deeds of which provide especially that religious instruction must (not may) be given, and in the management of these schools we take the responsibility of inquiring carefully, before a teacher is appointed, whether he or she is duly qualified to instruct little children in the elements of the Christian faith as taught in Holy Scripture. . . . . Upon these points Churchmen, as it seems to me, must stand firm.

And in support of this demand he puts forward the contention that "the value of the buildings greatly outweighs the cost of the denominational teaching, which is, therefore, practically paid for by the denomination to which the buildings belong." If the denomination merely appointed a teacher to come in and give an hour's religious instruction a day and left the staffing for secular instruction entirely in the hands of the local authority, there would be some truth in the contention that the privileges conferred are duly paid for; but it would still leave the Archbishop's opponents free to demand that the privileges shall be withdrawn. Obviously, the final exclusion of the sects from the control of public education will carry with it as a corollary the purchase, renting or abandonment, as may be agreed upon, of denominational buildings for educational purposes.

THE Archbishop and his friends must realise the fundamental fact that it is they, and not their opponents, who have abandoned the compromise of 1870. Having themselves reduced the proportionate figure they are willing to pay, in the execution of "a great trust," for the privilege of taking a hand in the provision of public education, they have no possible right to complain if the people come to the conclusion that the revised bargain—revised by one side only—is "not good enough," and that it would be more satisfactory that the complete control and the whole cost of that education should be undertaken by the State.

AT a meeting of the Court of Manchester University on Dec. 10 a resolution of great importance was passed ordaining the constitution of a Faculty of Theology. The adoption of the recommendation of the Senate to this effect was moved by Dr. McLaren, seconded by Mr. E. J. Broadfield, and supported by Professor Tont and the new Bishop of Manchester (Dr. Knox). The conditions named are the following:—

It will be necessary that part of the instruction in the Faculty should be given in the form of external lectures which must be open to all students on terms approved by the University. Such lectures must be given by a member of the teaching staff of some college or institution which is recognised for this purpose by the Court. Provision will be made for instruction by professors or lecturers of the University in Comparative Religion, this subject to be a compulsory subject for study and examination for degree. But no question shall be asked in any examination in such a form as to call for any expression of personal religious belief on the part of the candidate.

The working out of these proposals, now definitely adopted, will be watched with great interest. The Council is empowered to choose two persons distinguished for theological learning, and not members of the teaching staff, to join the Advisory Committee; and the Senate is to prepare a draft of studies with regulations for the degrees and courses of study in theology, and to report thereon to the Court.

IT was a happy augury that the new departure should receive the cordial approval of both Nonconformity and the Church, as represented in the speeches respectively of Dr. McLaren and the Bishop. The former remarked "that the title of University must be a misnomer unless they included the subject they were providing for in the synopsis before them. They might as well expect to cut a quadrant out of a circle and leave the circle entire. Although he had no mandate, he thought he might safely say on behalf of the students of all the Nonconforming Colleges in the district (and he hoped he might also say the Episcopal bodies), that they gladly accepted this draft constitution of the Faculty, and felt that the first act of the new University was one of large advantage to the highest interests of a great portion of the community."

To all this the Bishop gave a gracious assent. He said: "I am glad that my first meeting here should be in connection with this new and most important departure, which I fully agree with Dr. McLaren is essential to the real constitution of the University. One of the most important things we have to set before all teachers and all students of a university is the absolute unity of truth. You cannot learn any one part of the truth while you set aside contemptuously other parts, as though they were of no value. I can only say that, as far as any influence I have in connection with the preparation of candidates for holy orders in this diocese goes, I shall be only too glad if I can point them out courses in this University as being very desirable if they are to do their work properly and faithfully as it should be done.

M. D'ESTOURNELLES DE CONSTANT, leader of the International Arbitration Group in the French Parliament, has contributed an interesting paper on the significance of the Anglo-French entente cordiale to the pages of the L'Européen. He describes the official boycot by European Governments of the International Court at The Hague, and the way in which, after three years of war in South Africa and China, that boycot was broken by President Roosevelt. Early in 1902 M. de Constant laid the European attitude before the President of the United States, and declared that he was now the only man who could save the situation. A few months later the Venezuelan difficulty gave Mr. Roosevelt a great opportunity, and everyone knows how he used it. Again, in the following October, another American, Mr. Carnegie, further strengthened the position of the International Court by a gift of one and a half million dollars for a library and court-house. This action was followed by the French Government, which has this year included in its budget its first annual grant towards the expenses of the Court.

PROPOSALS for treaties of arbitration were made to France both by Norway and Sweden and by Holland, but these were refused, and the refusal has since been defended on the ground that they were wholly unnecessary. But, in spite of the opposition of diplomats and other officials, the popular feeling in favour of such treaties was rapidly increasing. The Parliamentary group of international arbitration rose in numbers from 100 to 250 members of the Chamber and Senate. Greeted at first with laughter, it soon found favour in public opinion. Nearly all the departmental councils (Conseils Généraux) and the Chambers of Commerce in the country gave it their support. Then followed the Royal, the Presidential, the Parliamentary visits, and the Anglo-French treaty. And this is only the first of a network of such treaties which are yet to cover the world. In M. de Constant's words:—"We shall soon see the representatives of all States, including those of America, meeting in Paris to celebrate there in an imposing communion, international peace."

THE funeral of Mr. Herbert Spencer took place on Monday, with absolute simplicity, according to his own express wish, and without religious service. The ashes were interred at Highgate Cemetery, after cremation at Golder's Green. At the Crematorium a memorial address was given by Mr. Leonard Courtney, Mr. John Morley, whom Mr. Spencer had wished to fulfil that office, being absent in Sicily. Mr. Courtney referred at the outset to his friendship with Mr. Spencer, who had desired him to take that place in case Mr. Morley could not be present, and then dwelt on the greatness of the work he had accomplished, the marvellous range of his knowledge, and the comprehensiveness of his thought. In conclusion, he spoke of Mr. Spencer's last thoughts on the "Riddle of the Universe," and the question of personal continuance raised in the presence of death.

Is the personality that dwelt in this poor frame to be admitted as in itself indestructible? Or must we acquiesce in its reabsorption in the infinite, the ever-abiding, the ineffable energy of which it was a passing spark? If indestructible in the future, must it not have been as incapable of coming into existence as it is incapable of ceasing to be? Our master knew not. He could not tell. The last enigma defies our question. The dimensions of the unknown may be reduced through successive ages, but compared with our slender discoveries, estimated at the best, a vastness that remains must ever overawe us. Looking back on the years of Spencer, we may say that he thus worked, he thus dedicated himself as truly and as bravely as any man enjoying the solace of a more definite creed. To this spirit, then, whose work survives, whose words yet speak, the wave of whose influence can yet pass from generation to generation, we may say in all the fulness of interpretation which the phrase can bear, "Farewell."

A TRIBUTE on behalf of the people of India was afterwards paid by Mr. Shyamaji Krishnavarma, who expressed his wish to give £1,000, by preference to his own University of Oxford, or else to London, to found a Spencer lectureship, similar to the Romanes lectureship at Oxford.

THE Essex Hall Pocket Almanac for 1904 is now ready. It is this time not a pocket-book, and those who do not like the change may take comfort, for it is not likely to happen again. Those who do like the change must be warned that they may not again be able to buy so much for a shilling.

ON Tuesday, December 8, Robert Collyer was eighty. Years ago he wrote a birthday meditation rich in the fragrance of his sunny faith. "I would love too," he wrote, "as I slip down towards the shadows, to nurse my heart on a grateful sense of the treasures I bear with me. . . . . I am very rich in memories, in the substance of things not seen, and because not seen, eternal; little or nothing of my own deserving, but untold treasures through God's free gift. I have memories that are more than a memory, too good and fair for regret—memories which are now as my life, lying deep and still where no storm can touch them, part and parcel of my other and inner self." And then, looking through the quiet portal of death, he said, "My whole faith goes into the assurance that these days would be shorn of their deepest meaning and purpose if they did not reach forth toward other days for their perfection. And so, as these years gather so swiftly, and I know I must be nearing the great mystery, I would bid my soul sit lightly on her throne, and with no great hunger to be gone, take care she does not hunger over much to stay." The loving wishes of many friends on both sides of the Atlantic will have gone out to him on his birthday.

IN the hope of bringing their publications more directly under the notice of members of our churches and schools throughout the country, the Committees of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association have united in appointing the Rev. Frederic Allen as Publication Agent for a period of six months, beginning with the New Year. Mr. Allen will arrange to make tours in different parts of the country, visiting churches and schools, so that he may have opportunities of personally calling attention to the value of our literature.

DR. G. DAWES HICKS, sub-editor of the Hibbert Journal, has been appointed Examiner in Moral Philosophy and Logic in the University of Glasgow.

WHEN goodness separates itself, it is only half good. A virtue which is not active is in danger itself of turning to vice. Jesus was not too good for publicans and sinners. How many of his disciples are?—J. F. Dutton.

JESUS spent his life in discoursing with humble people on life and duty, in giving wise answers, showing that he saw at a large angle of vision, and at least silencing those who were not generous enough to accept his thoughts. Luther spent his life so; and it is not his theologic works, his "Commentary on the Galatians," and the rest, but his "Table Talk," which is still read by men. Dr. Johnson was a man of no profound mind, full of English limitations, English politics, English church, Oxford philosophy; yet having a large heart, mother-wit, and good sense, which impatiently overleaped his customary bounds. His conversation as reported by Boswell has a lasting charm. Conversation is the vent of character as well as of thought.—R. W. Emerson.

"THE CHRIST OF EXPERIENCE."

SIR,—In a notice of the last of Mr. Carpenter's lectures at Nottingham, in your issue of the 12th inst., the lecturer is reported as saying: "He [Jesus] kneels with us, indeed, saying, 'Our Father'; but he does not interpose himself between us and God." I do not write in any controversial spirit; this is surely a question of historical fact. Is there a single passage in the Synoptic Gospels where Jesus is represented as "kneeling with" the disciples, and saying, "Our Father"? He teaches them to say "Our Father"; but he himself (as reported) always says "My Father" and "Your Father." I do not know whether Mr. Carpenter accepts the well-known passage in Matt. xi. 27 and Luke x. 22 as representing the thoughts of Christ himself, though there seem to be none but a priori reasons for regarding it as due to later christological influences. If such words as "Neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him," and those that follow, "Come unto me, all ye that labour," are accepted as truly representing an element in the teaching of Jesus, the statemant that "he does not interpose himself between us and God" can hardly be accepted as historically true. If they are held to be due to later doctrinal speculation, the questions still have to be faced: (1) What started such speculations? and (2) does the mythopoeic faculty yield products of such lyrical beauty and soul-moving efficiency as the sentences beginning "Come unto me"? Could anyone, in fact, make up such words, out of whose inner experience they did not flow?

My only excuse for troubling you with these remarks is my profound conviction that, if the facts of history are fairly faced, a basis of agreement will, in time, be found by those who seem at present to differ widely. EDWARD GRUBB.

Devonshire Chambers, E.C., Dec. 14, 1903.

"IN THE INTERESTS OF THE GOVERNED."

SIR,—I read with much interest your article on Mr. Joy's pamphlet; and a line or two on a pleasing memory will not, unfortunately, lessen the force of the indictment so far as Queensland is concerned.

A few years ago I was travelling on the Paroo, and, whilst enjoying the bountiful hospitality at a "head station," was particularly pleased with a "blackfellow" idyll. The manager and his charming womanly wife had gathered a little colony within the precincts. There was the former king, a diminutive old fellow of the utmost dignity of bearing. Mrs. C—— had had specially made for him a brass plate, inscribed with his name and "King of the Paroo tribe"; and the grey-bearded patriarch paraded with every sense of regality in an antiquated frock coat, decorated by this honourable medal.

The picture possessed its pathos; but the descendant of an ancient line of kings preserved his royal presence even when he asked (cadged) for tobacco and odd pence with which to sustain his court. A tale was told of him that once when droving cattle he had reached the crossing above Bourke on the Darling, he was transfixed by a terrific hooting noise, which seemed to come from down the river. Then, at the sight of a belching monster at the nearest corner of the meandering river, he cried "Bunyip," and fled, getting over the hundred and fifty miles that lay between the monster and his peaceful camping place in record time. The "monster" was the first river steamer that it had been his lot to see!

All visitors to the station or neighbours knew that the little sanctuary was inviolable; and whatever jests were made only redounded to the honour of C——, and emphasised the true manliness of his conduct.

He is not at the station now, and I have often wondered what has become of his black flock.

With regard to the "hopeless degradation" of the blackfellow, I may say that I have seldom seen a finer or more intelligent man than one of the younger men of the camp, who, in ready English, when asked his weight, replied, "Thirteen stun." The march of civilisation, there at all events, was found compatible with a happy native family.

TO MINISTERS AND OTHERS.

SIR,—Will you be good enough to give me space for a brief announcement? Mrs. Vance Smith has handed over to me a considerable number of copies of the last edition (1896) of the late Dr. Vance Smith's book, "The Prophets and their Interpreters" (pp. 48). It is Mrs. Vance Smith's wish that these should be distributed among ministers, students for the ministry, and any other persons interested in the subject. On receipt of a post-card, giving name and address, I shall be pleased to send a copy to any applicant.

DENDY AGATE.

Dunham-road, Altrincham,
Dec. 14.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.—In our note last week on the recent bazaar the figures were accidentally inverted. The takings really amounted to £2,100.

A WORD OF THANKS.—The Rev. Henry McKean, of Oldbury, having resumed work after his recent accident, desires publicly to express his gratitude to the ministers and laymen who for five months freely supplied his pulpit, the arrangements being undertaken by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Evesham, in the name of the Ministers' Monthly Meeting and the Lay Preachers' Union. Mr. McKean mentions other acts of kindness he received. We rejoice with him in these and in his recovery.

LITERATURE.

THAT great work, the "Dictionary of National Biography," was published in sixty-three quarterly volumes, from January, 1885, to June, 1900, and in the autumn of 1901 three supplementary volumes were added, making good some two hundred accidental omissions, and containing eight hundred memoirs of those eminent persons whose death had occurred during the publication of the dictionary. Thus the national record is brought down to the close of the nineteenth century, with the most fitting addition of a full biography of Queen Victoria, whose death came with the dawn of the new century, and also a memorial notice of Mr. George Smith, the head of the firm of Smith, Elder & Co., to whose energy, foresight, and generous public spirit as originator and publisher, the dictionary remains a lasting monument.

Before his death in 1901, Mr. George Smith had planned, in consultation with Mr. Sidney Lee, a final volume as Index and Epitome of the whole great work, and its publication has been one of the notable events of the present year in the world of letters. The sixty-six volumes of the dictionary contain 30,378 separate biographical notices, and 3,474 cross references. These are now all gathered up with infinite care into one closely printed volume of 1,456 pages, the biographies being condensed, generally speaking, to one-fourteenth of their original size. What we have, therefore, in this volume of Index and Epitome, is not only a most admirable and useful guide to the dictionary itself, which most people can only consult in a public library, but an independent work of the highest value, which many students and scholars will be thankful to possess. For this is, in fact, a miniature dictionary of national biography, rich in information, and of astonishing accuracy in the facts and the hundreds of thousands of dates it contains. The work of epitomising the biographies was shared by nine helpers, to whom the editor, Mr. Sidney Lee, makes his acknowledgments in the preface.

The great value of this volume as a concise Dictionary of National Biography may be gathered from the fact that the biography of Shakespeare fills more than three columns, that of Gladstone more than two, and those of Elizabeth, Cromwell, Charles I., the Duke of Wellington, Walpole, and Charles James Fox, each more than a column (of some seven hundred words). Mr. Sidney Lee's biography of Queen Victoria filled more than a hundred pages of the last supplementary volume, and in the Epitome occupies seven columns. It is interesting to notice the proportions of space given to some of the best known names. It must not always be taken as an accurate gauge of relative importance. Thus the list of Scott's novels fills out his biography and he has 76 lines, and Ruskin 71, but Carlyle only 43, and George Eliot 34, Dickens 40, and Thackeray 53. Wordsworth has 37, Chaucer and Tennyson 52 each, Milton 50, and Browning 46. John Wesley has 69 and Joseph Priestley 62. George Fox 20, Martineau 31, Dean Stanley 30, Darwin 36, and Huxley 39. There are 86 lines to a column.

The quality of the work done for the Dictionary of National Biography by a large number of distinguished contributors, has long been recognised as standing in the very first rank. In expressing our gratitude for this final volume, further words of praise or commendation would be superfluous, and we will only offer once more our warmest congratulations to all who have been concerned in bringing this work, which is a national possession, to so happy a completion.

MARTINEAU MISREAD.*

WE confess that we have found it difficult to be patient with Mr. Craufurd's book. He seems to us to presume a great deal too much on the few years of personal acquaintance he had with Dr. Martineau towards the close of his long life, and while he speaks repeatedly with the warmest admiration of "my friend" and "my teacher," and there is one fine passage on the sermons which in justice to the "disciple" we will quote directly, his criticisms show how little he really understood or had entered into the religious life of one of the most spiritually-minded of men. We imagine that Mr. Craufurd went to Dr. Martineau full of his own prepossessions, and we shrewdly suspect that in their intercourse he himself did most of the talking. Certainly in this book we should have been content with a good deal less of Craufurd and a little more of Martineau. Mr. Craufurd appears to us to have got "Deism" something very like a bee in his bonnet, and we find it difficult to harmonise his references to "the spiritual influence of this inspired seer" with his laments over the starved soul of one who died "in the bleak land of chilling and semi-Deistic Unitarianism." The spiritual Theism of James Martineau was something very different from the Deism or semi-Deism of Mr. Craufurd's imagination.

Professor Upton, indeed, in his contribution to the "Life and Letters," refers to the "rationalistic or Deistic side of Dr. Martineau's philosophy," and quotes from a paper of Mr. Craufurd's a passage on his dread of Pantheism, and the essentially lonely and non-social character of his religion; but Mr. Upton hastens to add: "Such criticism does not do justice to Dr. Martineau's philosophy as a whole. The ethical rationalist inevitably tends to become an 'Intuitivist' or Mystic, just as Judaic Theism naturally developed into Christian Theism." (Vol. ii. p. 478.) And we shall append to this notice the admirable letter from Mr. Upton which appeared in last week's Spectator, on "Dr. Martineau's Relation to Unitarianism."

Of Martineau's sermons, Mr. Craufurd writes as follows:—

> Out of this noble master's three volumes of sermons one might compile a splendid manual of devout thought, lit up by piercing moral insight, and pervaded by the very finest spiritual judgment, a manual which might well be to our age what the Pensées of Pascal have been to former ages. Scarcely can we find elsewhere in English literature such a rare combination of delicacy of perception, purity of motive, strength of intellect, and beauty of expression. Hardly any thinker since the days of Plato has linked such profound and subtle thoughts with such glorious language.

To his Recollections and Essay Mr. Craufurd adds some letters which he received from Dr. Martineau. One of these, dated from Aviemore in August, 1892, the first year of their acquaintance, contains a characteristic passage, which we will quote. Dr. Martineau is referring to two of Mr. Craufurd's books:—

> In general, I find myself in sympathy with your admirations, and at variance only with your aversions. Your great store of enthusiasm and compassionate affection pours itself, I should say, in too exclusive a flood upon the sins and miseries of unregulated passion. I catch myself, as I read, pleading for a gentler judgment on commonplace people of the conscientious type, beneath the evenness of whose life there often—even usually—lie a depth and unselfishness of character essentially, though silently, heroic. It is not to these, the faithful without romance, but to the mock-righteous and the self-righteous, that Christ prefers the publicans and sinners, who, when converted by your forgiving love, can only be brought to the very harmony of desire and will with which you contrast them.

Mr. Craufurd is good enough to say that his book is intended "to supplement and not to supersede that very valuable work," the Life and Letters, by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton, and he adds that "Mr. Upton's presentation of Martineau's philosophy is so entirely admirable that it is not likely to be ever superseded."

The following is Professor Upton's letter above alluded to:—

To the Editor of the "Spectator."

SIR,—In the interesting "Recollections of James Martineau," by the Rev. A. H. Craufurd, which is noticed with commendation in the Spectator for Oct. 31, there appears in various forms a very serious misstatement which is emphatically repudiated by those who knew Dr. Martineau far more intimately than Mr. Craufurd knew him, and which, if left uncorrected, will inevitably mislead the readers of that book in regard to Dr. Martineau's relation to the Unitarian conception of Christianity. Mr. Craufurd's contention is that in Dr. Martineau's religious life there was a constant internal discord between his "intellect" and his "heart"; that while his intellect, owing to his semi-Deistic training, always kept him a Unitarian, his spiritual affections were continually prompting him to embrace a more "orthodox" idea of God. "James Martineau," he says, "followed his intellect to the very end, even though it kept him back from that light and warmth and nourishment which he discerned from afar in the more fertile regions of liberalised Orthodoxy." And again:—"Dr. Martineau's formal creed tore him up by the roots from the soil that was most truly congenial to his loftiest instincts. The deep-souled mystic within him often sat down and wept in the Babylon into which earlier intellectual convictions had led him." This alleged discord in Dr. Martineau's mind had no real existence; it is wholly a creation of Mr. Craufurd's imagination. As all his intimate friends well know, Dr. Martineau found in the conception of God as unipersonal both intellectual and spiritual satisfaction. His warm appreciation of the most spiritual utterances of Christians of every denomination did not in the slightest degree clash with his Unitarian view of the Godhead. In his opinion, the triune conception of the Deity was not necessary for the complete appreciation of the divinest elements in Christian mysticism, and in Evangelical hymns and discourses. Mr. Craufurd has been led astray by Dr. Martineau's not unfrequent dissatisfaction with the condition of some of his co-religionists; but this dissatisfaction was not at all with their Unitarianism, but only with their defective spirituality, and this lack of deep spirituality he in part traced back to the somewhat unfavourable philosophical and theological antecedents out of which modern Unitarianism has arisen. Hence he was accustomed to say of those persons in other Christian denominations who showed a leaning to the Unitarian view of the Godhead: "Their escape from the old orthodox scheme is by a better path than ours." And his explanation of this was that through the dogma of the Incarnation the Church has most providentially preserved and transmitted through the ages the essential and distinctive truth of Christianity, the truth, viz., of the living presence and self-revelation of the Eternal Father in the spirits of His rational offspring. "This interpretation," he says, "of Christ's life on earth carries the Divine essence claimed for him into our nature as his brethren." In Dr. Martineau's opinion, much current Unitarianism, owing to its philosophical ancestry and its ecclesiastical isolation, has largely failed to realise this vital truth, and hence "the aridity and barrenness" to which Mr. Craufurd refers; but many Unitarians have profoundly realised the essential truth involved in the Incarnation of God in Christ; and in fellowship with such Unitarians Dr. Martineau's whole nature found complete satisfaction.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ON PREACHING AND PREACHERS.*

THESE two little books treat of the same subject from different points of view, the English from the Anglican, the American apparently from that of Evangelical dissent.

Dr. Ford pleads for fuller realisation by the clergy of the importance of preaching, and contrasts the inadequate equipment of the young curate on entering the pulpit ("men from college are obtruded upon long-suffering congregations, and forced to make in public crude attempts to do effectively what they have never been trained to do at all") with the careful training of the preaching powers of their students by the Roman and dissenting churches. The Roman training is no doubt stringent and adequate.

Whilst among our churches the tendency in the past has been too often to subordinate all things to the sermon, so that congregations also were learning to regard the essential part of the service as a mere preliminary, and still far too little attention is sometimes given to its reverent and orderly conduct, Dr. Ford protests earnestly against the neglect of preaching in the church, the subordinate position of the sermon in clerical and lay regard, and the almost contempt with which 'preachments' are often spoken of. He points to the crowded congregations that assemble when a real preacher is announced as evidence that a 'preachment' is appreciated when offered, and urges that the church is failing in her mission in not cultivating her preaching powers to the utmost.

All this is admirably said, but when he goes further and deprecates the regarding of the acts of the priest rather than the preacher's words as supreme in worship, when he quotes with approval Canon Henson's saying that preaching is "the highest function of the Christian ministry," then Dr. Ford goes too far. Make preaching more, but, from the Anglican point of view, the priestly function cannot be less.

"Quiet Hints in my Study," Mr. Jefferson calls his book. The reader is inclined to wonder what the straight talks in the open would be. The vocabulary is distinctly not quiet, and the unbridled outspokenness of the style is sometimes violent. For example:—

> If a congregation were a colossus to be attacked by rhetorical bludgeons, or a mammoth baby to be tickled by vocal pyrotechnics, or a monster to be tricked and trapped by oratorical devices, yelling might not be without justification. . . . But a yell is scarcely worse than a tone. A tone is a clerical whine, a pulpit twang, an oily, sanctimonious, vocal monstrosity. A tone is cant vocalised. It is affectation coined into breath. It is the most disgusting sound which the universe emits. It is better that a minister should be afflicted with yellow fever than with a tone. With the yellow fever he might die.

But all is not thus, and it would be as great a pity to set the book aside because of the marked characteristics of its style as to refuse to read a modern Keim because of the involution of his sentences. For this is really a useful book. Preachers experienced as well as inexperienced will do well to get it. There is not perhaps much that is particularly new, but there is gathered here the ripe fruit of much practical experience; with a good deal of shrewd wisdom, there is a good deal of really wise counsel and valuable suggestion; and preachers of every age will value the warnings of dangers, to all but exceptional natures, inevitably associated with their special work, and be grateful for reminders of consolation in disheartening hours equally inevitable. The titles of some of the chapters will suggest the practical usefulness of the book: Starts good and bad, the foremost of the demons (Laziness), Cowardice, Impatience, Clerical Hamlets (Melancholy), Autocracy, Vanity, Discontent, Pettiness, Mannerisms, Near to men near to God, Unconscious Decay.

The matter which is common to both these books is, however, the most important part of each: the first principles of preaching which all preachers need to be reminded of from time to time. A sermon is not a lecture. It is not a moral essay. It need not be a literary work of art. What academic sermons that are not sermons, what artificially poetic or otherwise booky sermons we have to listen to! The sermon must be a message of life. The preacher must have that which is so important, so wonderful to himself that he must declare and share it. But often as one listens, one thinks the preacher has been saying to himself: "This is the place for a sermon; I suppose there must be one; but what a bother it is. Well, I suppose I must preach this." Much better not. Much better give out another hymn and close the service. The preacher must be in dead earnest about his message, and be eager to convey it to his hearers. And to convey it best, to wise and simple alike, he must be simple. Fireworks suggest doubt of earnestness. Simplicity and earnestness are closely linked. And he must be natural. Long-drawn tones, misplaced adverbs, a fixed smile or frown, a heavenward gaze riveted upon a distant corner of the roof, a pawing of the air or fluttering of the hand—such things are not aids to receiving a message, still less to devotion; they rather hinder, since they either amuse or irritate. The preacher must be simple; he must be natural. Above all, he must be himself, speaking from the pulpit as he would speak anywhere else on serious and sacred things. During the first part of the service the minister is to be an impersonal voice, in the pulpit the preacher must be a personality. Personality is half the sermon. Therefore, let not the preacher allow committees and other detail work to destroy his personality, nor let him overwhelm himself with books. "Reading makes a full man, and it may fill him to his undoing." "Killed by books" is many a preacher's epitaph. Fulness of life is ten thousand times more important for the preacher than fulness of scholarship. Let him know men and life. Two-thirds of life in the world, one-third in the study. To understand men is more than to understand books. A message and the man to deliver it. We must have the one and be the other, or let us not climb the pulpit stairs.

Let your sermon (says Dr. Ford) be such that, when heard, your hearers come away not so much vying with each other in laudatory terms of its literary beauty, its oratorical excellence, or its dramatic force, but, rather, rapt in silent thought, because they feel within them a transmitted influence too deep and sacred for utterance.

R. D.

THERE is no external politeness which has not a root in the moral nature of man. Forms of politeness, therefore, should never be inculcated on young persons without letting them understand the moral ground on which all such forms rest.—Goethe.

SHORT NOTICES.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL'S Essex Hall lecture on Emerson will have been far from satisfying to devoted followers of the New England seer. What they will delight in most in the lecture as now published is the beautiful portrait which is prefixed, the same that was used for the centenary edition of the Divinity School address. Yet there is both amusement and instruction to be got from the lecture, and extensive quotations from Emerson himself. Mr. Birrell, it will be remembered, drew a picturesque contrast between Emerson and Newman as contemporary teachers and leaders of men.

In the "thirties" Boston was at least as agitated as Oxford, and better fitted to give a hearing to tracts for and not against the times. In Oxford the objective of attack was a barren, faithless churchmanship, and what was to be made alive was the idea of the Church as a living witness to the truth, an authoritative voice which, if appealed to, would answer as surely as of old on Sinai or at Pentecost. In Boston what was attacked was a barren, stagnant Socinianism, and what was to be restored was the Temple of the living God in the soul of man. Oxford looked regretfully back upon the fourth century, and Boston enthusiastically forward to the unfolding of future mysteries.

One of Mr. Birrell's amusing mots occurred in his account of the change of New England from strict Calvinism to Unitarianism. "Dr. Watts' Hymns were written for a crowded nursery." We pointed out after the lecture was given, that though the laugh was good, it was not the Hymns, but the Moral Songs that were written for the nursery. Now, Mr. Birrell prints, "Dr. Watts' Hymns and Moral Songs, &c." But the Hymns were not written for the nursery. They are entirely distinct from the "Divine and Moral Songs." Another sentence added in the printed lecture is towards the end, after quoting Holmes' saying that not Unitarianism, but a mild Episcopalianism now reigns in Boston: "But it may well be there has been another change since Dr. Holmes wrote his life of Emerson." (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand. 1s. net.)

Chart and Voyage, "an examination of the alleged reasons for theological reserve, and the dangers incurred by it," is an essay by Mr. T. J. Hardy, whose "Confession of Heresy" and various contributions to these columns will be remembered by our readers. This is an earnest but perfectly temperate and reasonable plea for frankness in religious matters. The writer ventures to appeal, toward the end of his essay, by name to certain theologians of the Broad School to give their reasons for their policy of half concealment, for hiding themselves behind ambiguities of expression, for holding publicly forms which they reject in private. More than once in the book the same kind of challenge is thrown out. The learned Dean, who would so explain, or who hopes that at some time someone will explain the virgin-birth of Jesus in such a manner as to make it conform to biological law, is asked to bring forward evidence for the fact itself such as would justify a practical man in risking money or any other thing that he cared for on the chance of its proving to be true. One would be glad to hope that this little essay would be read, pondered, and, may be, answered by those whom it thus immediately concerns. But it will do many others good to read the book. Those who have long ago chosen the better part of simple sincerity, who have refused to bemuddle their own understandings by asking first whether their usefulness might not be impaired by strict veracity; or whether, seeing that what human beings can know at all is so little and so uncertain, it can make much difference if they do assent for the present to something which seems incredible; who have accepted the duty of straightforward dealing and perfectly candid speech without reserve, will find some encouragement in Mr. Hardy's philosophical presentation of the matter, and will be the better able to answer to themselves and to others for the righteous course they have taken. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand. 1s. net.)

More Fireside Fables, by Edwin P. Barrow, adds eighty-nine of these suggestive and often quaint little bits of wisdom and imagination to the collection of the former volume. A few of these have already appeared in THE INQUIRER. To the fables, Mr. Barrow appends four rather longer stories, completing a series of ten, intended to illustrate the main sources of unkindness to animals. (Elliot Stock. 1s. 6d. net.)

Uncle Ranger's Yarns, by A. H. Biggs, M.A., is for Band of Hope workers, who want some thoroughly interesting and exciting fairy tales, which are at the same time pointed parables, teaching total abstinence. In the reading of these tales there is plenty of scope for dramatic recital, and we can well believe that as told by their author they have been extremely popular. Vivid Arabian Night imagination and plenty of humour go to the making of the tales. (R. J. James, 3 and 4, London House Yard, Paternoster Row, E.C. Cloth, 1s.)

The Picture Lessons from the Parables of Jesus, issued by the Sunday School Association, consist of twelve cards, with pictures illustrating as many parables, with subject and a memory verse, and reference to the Gospel passage, printed on each, twelve other cards, with suggestive lessons on each parable, for the teacher's use, and an extra card with useful hints to teachers on how to use the lessons, all contained in a strong envelope. The pictures are in clear outline, admirably drawn, suggesting to young artists the desire to fill them in with colours. The lesson hints also seem to be admirably done, by one who knows how to teach and keep a vivid interest awake. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 4d. net.)

THE new volume of Young Days (vol. 28, 1903) is attractive as ever. Mr. Thomas Robinson's illustrated nature studies, telling of the flowers of the month, are really delightful, and this year the Rev. George Critchley has contributed a series of parables for the guild work, which must have roused a great deal of interest among the children in finding out their meaning. The exciting stories of adventure have also doubtless been enjoyed by not too critical readers. There are, as always, charming pages for the very little ones. (S. S. Assoc. 1s. 6d. net.)

DOCTRINE IN THE CHURCH.

THE article by the Rev. C. E. Beeby on "The Doctrinal Significance of a Miraculous Birth," which appeared in the October number of the Hibbert Journal, was not allowed to pass without episcopal censure. The Bishop of Worcester had an interview with Mr. Beeby, after which he addressed to him a letter which has now been published in the Diocesan Magazine. This letter lays stress on the fact that, though Mr. Beeby argues against the doctrine of the Virgin Birth of Jesus, he does not explicitly reject it. The implication seems to be that if the doctrine had been explicitly rejected by any of his clergy, the Bishop would have taken steps of a much graver kind than he considers necessary at present. There follows an array of great names on the side of that doctrine, and a profession—"I know of no names of comparable weight to be set upon the other side"—which is saved from utter absurdity by the addition of two more words, "in England." Then comes the more important part of the letter.

"I say, then," writes Dr. Gore, "that every clergyman holds his position as an officer of the Church in England on condition of the constant public recitation of his personal belief that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, and that he rose the third day from the dead. These clauses are perfectly free from ambiguity. They simply affirm that certain events recorded in the Gospel narratives truly occurred.

"Now, consistently with public honour, a man cannot hold his official position in virtue of constantly saying 'I believe' such and such a proposition to be true, unless he do believe it. And if he does believe it, I do not understand how he can write against it, as it appears to me you have done.

"I am very anxious to maintain the comprehensiveness of the Church of England, but comprehensiveness in any coherent society involves limits. It appears to me that the three chief conditions of office-holding in the Church of England (apart from moral character) are:—

"(1) That a man should believe the unambiguous historical statements of the Creed which he is constantly required to say 'I believe.'

"(2) That he should abide by his solemn undertaking that 'in Public Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments he will use the Form in the [Prayer-book] prescribed and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority.

"And (3) that he should observe his undertaking to teach nothing as part of the necessary faith, but what is contained in Scripture.

"I consider myself as Bishop bound to go to the limits of my power in maintaining these conditions, as well as the large comprehension which they guard. I am very anxious not to press you unduly, or, as the saying is, 'put you into a corner'; I quite recognise the possibility of expressing opinions speculatively, without identifying ourselves with them. For this reason I shall not ask for or expect at present anything but an acknowment of this letter. At the same time I ought to tell you that I may find it desirable to publish it."

The state of things which this incident, in common with others which our readers will remember, reveals in the Church of England is unsatisfactory to progressive and conservative theologians alike. One clergyman after another makes clear, in some kind of public utterance, that the dogma of the Virgin Birth is one which he would like to see removed from the list of necessary beliefs. The limits of mere suggestion and implication are reached but not passed. None has yet ventured to avow—or, at least, to persist in avowing—that he disbelieves in the alleged miracle. It has not yet, therefore, become possible to bring before the courts, and settle once for all, whether a minister in the State Church may legally reject the Virgin Birth; in other words, whether the Creed, as regards that article at least, is to be considered a dead letter. It is heartily to be desired, in the interests of the Church itself, and of certain grave matters referred to in the Bishop's letter, that some one of the Broad Church clergy would venture far enough to bring about such a clearance of the air. This is the season of Advent lectures. The Dean of Westminster is giving a series, which concludes to-day, on the Athanasian Creed. To-day's lecture is that which promises to have most interest for the general public, for it is to deal specifically with the damnatory clauses.

It is important [the lecturer says] to distinguish from the outset between [the] doctrinal statements and the surrounding clauses by which they are protected; between what I may call the picture itself and the frame in which it is set for its safe keeping. The frame is rude and strong, the product of a rough age, which valued ascertained truth, but had no mind for further speculation. There is no doubt that in the present day the frame does grave injustice to the picture; so much so, indeed, that most observers hardly see the picture at all in the pre-occupation with the frame.

There is truth enough to give point in the little sarcasm with which this quotation ends, but it is a two-edged truth. In the same number of the Guardian which contains the report of the Dean's lecture appear two letters on the Athanasian Creed, each of which is wholly devoted to a defence of the damnatory clauses. Advent lectures on "Sin and the Fall" are being delivered in Birmingham by Dr. Gore. In their case, too, the chief interest attaches to those which have not yet been reported.

MR. BEEBY has taken a course which is, no doubt, "the nobler and the manlier one." His decision has been conveyed to the Bishop in the following letter:—

Yardley Wood Vicarage, near Birmingham, Dec. 14, 1903.

MY LORD,—In my letter to you, dated November 9, I wrote:—"If and when you publish your letter I shall have to consider the situation, and duly weigh your opinion."

Your letter, now published, not only in the Diocesan Magazine, but advertised in every religious and secular newspaper in the kingdom, by your suggestion of want of honour on my part in remaining in office in the Church of England places me in a position in the eyes of the clergy and the laity of the diocese which I cannot tolerate, and my relations to your lordship are of so strained and painful a character that it is impossible for me to contemplate the longer continuance of them. I therefore have resolved, after most deliberate consideration, to resign my position, and I do now place my resignation in the hands of your lordship.—I am, my lord, your lordship's obedient servant,

CHARLES E. BEEBY.

V.

"Love rejoiceth not in unrighteousness, but rejoiceth with the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

A FRENCH writer said: "Wisdom cannot enter an unkind spirit, and knowledge without conscience is the ruin of the soul." This is very like what Paul said so many hundred years ago: "If I know all mysteries and all knowledge, . . . but have not love, I am nothing." And now, in our verse to-day, Paul says that one who has the love of goodness and truth can never take part in what is unrighteous, or take pleasure in what is wrong, or in seeing wrong succeed. He will not swerve aside from the truth, but stand to it with whole-hearted faithfulness, as the martyrs did in the face of death.

I am afraid that in these comfortable days we are much too easy-going, and do not stand firm for the right and true, as we should do. In your school life, when you see boys or girls doing wrong, do you always stand firm and refuse to join them? And not only that, but have you the courage to say that you do not think it right? Do you ever remember, too, that you can very seldom yield to temptation without leading someone else with you; and that if you resist and stand for the right you may help a companion to do the same? It is very hard to stand alone, even in little things, but sometimes it is the only right thing to do; and if we are faithful we are compelled to do it.

During the bombardment of Alexandria one of the marines on board one of the vessels was sentry at the captain's cabin door. All the other men were sent below for shelter. During the confusion of getting ready for action they forgot to have the sentry taken off his post, which was in a most exposed position. First one shell burst in the cabin close to him, and then another and another, and on the men coming up from below to see what damage had been done they still found the sentry marching placidly up and down at his post; and when they asked why he did not go below under cover with the other men, his reply was that his post was at the cabin door, and that as he had not been told to leave, he could not leave his post.

Did he not stand alone before a terror far worse than we are likely to meet in our daily lives? That is the spirit in which we ought to meet even our little trials; "faithful unto death." Our post is "at the cabin door; and till we have been told to leave, we cannot go."

"Love beareth all things;" yes; persecutions and troubles, little or great, and the faults and unkindness of others, or their ignorance and folly, without exposing them, or being wounded, or angry; it is like "suffereth long, and is kind."

"Believeth all things": that means that love is without suspicion or distrust of others—it is generous and confiding.

"Love hopeth all things." It never despairs of anyone; but trusts and believes that even those who sin will come round to better things. Many a time when a person has been wicked and has felt as if all chance for him is gone, if he has found one friend to believe in him and to be hopeful and raise his thoughts, and who has helped him to hope and to raise himself, his whole life has been changed by this "Love," which was stronger than sin and than despair; and by "hoping all things" it has helped him to begin a new life.

Do you not know how easy it is to be surprised into doing wrong, because you did not expect the temptation to come just then? Well, the only way is to be always ready: to be so well armed and so wakeful that no enemy creeps up and finds you sleeping: a good soldier does not sleep at his post. You must fight the good fight with open eyes and a ready heart, and be ready to say "No" with firmness and without hesitation—with the love that can "endure all things." Jesus tells his disciples that they are to watch as if the master of the house were away and had left his servants in charge, and commanded the porter to watch. "Watch, therefore; for ye know not when the lord of the house cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch."

"Love endureth all things" contains more meaning than there is space to tell, but you can think of much of the meaning for yourselves. It endures trials—such as we all have—small and great; trials of temper, of faith, of patience, of courage, of sickness, or accident. Some people are invalids for life. Try and think what that would mean; yet even many children have to bear it; no more play and running about, no more school life, no more merry times of romps and glee with young friends; only patience and endurance; and yet, children, many a one who is compelled to lead such a life is the joy and delight of his home and friends and companions, because of the loving spirit which makes him able to accept and "endure all things."

"Love never faileth"; but whether there be prophecies, they shall be done away with; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part." Love is the only thing that can never die, and remains for ever; all these other things that we value and are proud of are only for a time; we only know and learn a little part at a time of all that there is to know and learn. It is like climbing a mountain; the stones that we used like steps are left behind one after another, and we pass on and up till we stand on the peak which they have helped us to climb; "we know in part"; not the whole at once can we learn and understand, but little by little we "rise by stepping stones to higher things." The childs's A B C and little sums are only beginnings—the first steps; they "vanish away" into what he learns afterwards. But through all the changes one thing "never faileth," and that is Love.

ADVENT PEACE.

ONCE more the appeal of "Peace Sunday" is to be made in the churches, and we have to ask ourselves how we can most surely be true to the spirit of the coming Christmas festival. If we are to help to make "peace on earth" we must be at peace with our own hearts, and for this surely there is but one way, whatever method may appear the wisest and most helpful—the way of giving. The joy of Christmas is in the heart of unselfishness, in the self-sacrificing love of CHRIST, and with that joy, even through the agony of the Cross, the ultimate peace.

Abundant opportunity is offered to us at this moment to realise and enter into that peace. Close at hand, and especially in every great city, the mute appeal of suffering and poverty, of cheerless, unlovely, and unloving lives is heard. Our missionaries are appealing for help to bring some more abundant life into barren, cheerless places, through their ministry of brotherly love. We ask our readers not to overlook the appeals they have made during these last weeks. And everycitizen of this country is asked to take a share in wise counsel and generous giving, to face the problem of distress and lack of employment which threatens during the present winter to be so acute. The wider problems of Empire and commerce have also to be faced, and in the same spirit that shall make for peace. In this connection we commend to the attention of our readers the sermon by the Rev. CHAS. HARGROVE in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit on "The Golden Rule and the Tariff."

One other special appeal is to be made to-morrow, to all who realise not only the claims of humanity, but the responsibility of their country in this matter—an appeal for the sufferers in Macedonia.

In the December Commonwealth Mr. HENRY NEVINSON tells of what he saw in the Monastir district at the beginning of the terrible Macedonian winter, and of the misery with which he was obliged to pass by so much heart-breaking suffering, without even a promise of help to come, because he could not be sure that there would be enough to meet all the needs. These are his concluding words :—

Out upon those mountains, in snow and bitter wind, at the very least some 60,000 human beings are starving in the skeleton ruins of their homes, and there is no one to help them, no friendly frontier for them to cross, no justice or mercy for their appeal. So far, the Macedonian Relief Fund has been the only little sign of hope or feeling. I cannot speak too highly of the work its agents have done—of the work of Mr. Brailsford in organising the whole, and himself directing the distribution round Ochrida ; of the work of Mrs. Brailsford in her hospital for the wounded and other undertakings at Ochrida, too ; of the work of the Lazarist Father Proy at Klisura ; of the French Sisters of Mercy at Florina ; and the American Missionaries at Resna and Debritza and Monastir. It is much, and yet it is so little ; for twenty times more is wanted still.

And now we have the testimony of General TZONTCHEFF that, "but for the English people, thousands of villagers who are now endeavouring to repair the disasters of the summer would have been in their graves. English help has fed, clothed, and housed them. English sympathy has revived their broken spirit." That, indeed, is not enough, and we must hope that during this winter steps will be taken by the Western Powers effectually to prevent a repetition of the awful tragedy of the summer, and to secure lasting peace for Macedonia. Yet for us this immediate duty is clear, and we trust that our "Peace Sunday" will be marked by abundant gifts for these sufferers.

MR. W. R. CREMER, M.P., the recipient of the Nobel award of nearly £8,000 for the best peace work of the year, has richly deserved his honour. The English side of the Anglo-French rapprochement, and, indeed, all the inter-parliamentary conferences of recent years, probably owe more to his initiative than to that of any other individual. We cordially congratulate both Mr. Cremer and the makers of the award. It is delightful to find that such labours as his do at times win their rightful recognition ; and that the victor of peace does sometimes receive some of that public gratitude which is never denied the military hero.

WE are indebted to the Rev. H. S. Perris for the carefully prepared table of figures, which accompanies his article this week, referring to Unitarian Churches and Missions and gathered from the results of the recent Daily News Religious Census of London. There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the figures so far as they go, but it is to be remembered that they represent the attendances on only one chance Sunday at each place, and, e.g., the census was taken on the same day at Hampstead and Kensington, about the worst Sunday in the year. Those figures, therefore, are far from normal, and too much significance must not be attached to the arrangement of the churches in the order of the totals of attendance. As to Mr. Perris's suggestion of a Committee of Inquiry we express no opinion. We ask our readers to take the Christmas holidays for its consideration. In the New Year we shall be glad to find space for full discussion, if it is desired.

THE REIGN OF LOVE.

A CHURCH OF THE PRESENT.*

BY THE REV. E. L. H. THOMAS.

THERE is nothing about which more has been written than about the Church of the Future. Probably every church can depict, in outline at least, the coming Church, and it requires some little effort to confess, lest we be charged with eccentricity, that some of us know nothing about the Church of the Future. And we would fain escape from the illusion, which, while it seems to act as a temporary stimulus, is also probably sapping our normally available strength, so as to leave us ultimately, if not faithless and hopeless, yet, and what is worse, loveless and joyless. But I am far from supposing that the many portrayals of the Church of the Future owe their origin to any disappointed self-delusions, or to any unhealthy desire of deriving some otherwise unattainable consolation for the present need, nor do I believe for a moment that each of these future churches is a fascinating mirage seen on the far horizon, beyond the hot sands of what sometimes seems religion's interminable desert ; still less would I hold that each Church has drugged itself with hope so as to conjure up a flattering future for itself. No ; but whilst these things betray undoubtedly a certain prevailing sense of strain, and restlessness, discontent and weariness, I think they are also eloquent of a new order of things ; they reveal the existence, within and without the official churches, of a church broader and higher, and, in its spirit, sweeter than any of the existing churches.

Shortcomings of Actual Churches.

The churches seem to be afflicted with a certain self-conscious unnaturalness. While claiming to be each and all a means to salvation, personal regeneration and social uplifting, they are confronted with overwhelming evidence that they cannot reach the multitudes, nor do the multitudes come to them. And in the midst of all this they maintain towards each other an attitude of zealous hostility. "To them," says Mr. Charles Booth towards the conclusion of his monumental work on "Life and Labour in London," "we look for the methods of improvement ; but their zeal itself brings its difficulty. Each is too apt to cry 'I am the way,' and to be unable to admit any other possible salvation."

It is not jealousy, for jealousy, like imitation, is a manifest form of approval, but positive hostility, due, it may be, to the feeling that one proposal traverses another, but far more to actual condemnation of the efforts made by others, however well-intentioned they may be. And from this feeling of antagonism it is that each effort is apt to draw its greatest strength. To find a fulcrum which shall neither be nor involve hate is . . . the greatest difficulty of all.

And how deeply significant and prophetic are these words :—

The religious bodies will, I think, incline more and more to intensive work, but they, too, need to recognise that they have a double task—in the raising of the human ideal, which applies to all, as well as the gathering in of the few who respond fully to any particular doctrines taught.

* A paper read at the Autumnal Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Manchester on Wednesday, Nov. 11.

"I can imagine," says another careful observer, Mr. E. P. Barrow, "that the next great religious movement in this country may be out of the line of Church movement altogether." And in these words of Dr. John Watson ("Ian Maclaren") we have a vivid presentment of the present state of things with an outline of a fairer future.

No serious person (he said), whether he be religious or non-religious, could look out upon society in our day without being depressed and alarmed. There was a general unsettlement, both of belief and institutions; a weariness of the present and an uncertainty about the future—a lowering of ideals and a slackening of energy; an exhausted atmosphere in which it was difficult to breathe, and which was apt to be charged with noxious germs. Except in the problems of physical science, no conspicuous progress was being made, and no great men were rising—no poet, no novelist, no painter, no statesman, and no preacher. It was an age of mediocrity and commonplace. They were tired. What one longed for was another of those great movements which suddenly break forth one knew not whence, and which carried the race one knew not whither. They would do well, therefore, to pray for a great revival, for the coming of a new age with fresh faith and unimagined triumphs, and it could not be brought about by organisation any more than they could hasten spring by lighting a fire on frozen ground, or create day by turning on the electric light. . . . Had they not reason to expect that the message of the next revival would be social righteousness, and its effects the redemption, not of a single individual, but the national life.

And I think the lines from a poem of the late Mr. Lecky widely quoted as descriptive of himself are no less descriptive of a large section of Society whom religion, in its ordinary acceptation, has ceased either to attract or to inspire.

> High hopes were killed;
> But duty lived. He sought not far
> The "might be" in the things that are;
> His ear caught no celestial strain;
> He dreamt of no millennial reign.
> Brave, true, unhoping, calm, austere,
> He laboured in a narrow sphere,
> And found in work his spirit needs—
> The last, if not the best of creeds.

The Hidden Church of the Ideal.

Endless, indeed, seem to be the indications in literature and the daily trend of life that men are asking with meaning and with awakened interest of each of the churches, "Art thou the church that cometh, or look we for another?" And that other is in the midst, always present, represented not by any church exclusively, represented largely outside their borders, represented by that element of mind and heart, which, when men see, they as naturally exclaim "Ah! that is Christian," as John the Baptist exclaimed when he beheld its prototype and pattern "Behold the Lamb of God." That this church is gradually changing and absorbing the others and showing a more excellent way of generating strength by the constraint of love than by the clash of hostile efforts, is the fact that is beginning to dawn with startling reality before the eyes of men. But the change has involved, and is involving, a struggle which cannot but entail a periodical sense of weariness; for even well-doing has no immunity from weariness, and having done all for a time men must simply stand, yet without doffing for a moment any part of the whole armour of God. It is this church in whose bosom men have always found rest and in which they have found their hearts' desires. It is a meeting place wherever men meet, as the word church indicates, of the master, for the master, by the master. Its members are indeed dogmatists, but the dogmatists of Love. It is said of a well-known mystic, that "his essays might well be the favourite reading of those to whom beauty must come with a certain dogmatism, if it is to be accepted for what it is." In a similar sense love must come with a certain dogmatism if it is to be accepted for what it is. With this dogmatism men can boldly proclaim that the man who knows God, knows all things and fears nothing. "Ye have an unction," said John, "from the Holy One, and ye know all things."

Freedom and Conviction.

Another mark of this church is its freedom; not the imperfect kinds of freedom, freedom from State control, or freedom to do or think as one likes, not the freedom that separates and holds aloof, but the perfect freedom, that combines and assists, and is the fruit more than the condition of service, the perfect freedom of the great paradox uttered in the words, "whose service (i.e., service to whom) is perfect freedom." A religious body must have settled convictions. We must allow ourselves to be startled by the expression convict in the word conviction, in order to accept the situation of being imprisoned and bound by our belief—that we may be prisoners of the Lord, bond-slaves to God, whose bond-slavery is perfect freedom. As there is no finality in truth but only in love, this Church cannot be based upon the shifting foundations of changing aspects of man's knowledge of God, but upon the invulnerable dogma of love. There can be no unity arrived at by way of the demand for a common intellectual consent. There may be, on those lines, as there has been a barren mechanical uniformity, but effective, fruitful unity can only be achieved by the voluntary constraint of love. Men's minds are proving less disposed to be welded mechanically into any set of predestined moulds, and, without any prejudice or detriment to the high claims of truth, they are disposed to find a natural unity under the common and universal inspirations of love. Not speculatively to discover what God in essence and nature is, is the object of inquiry of this Church, but by purity of heart to know what He wills us to do, that is the object and method.

Dynamics of Love.

Experimental, therefore, in a high sense. I noticed a striking phrase in the address of the Royal Society to the Owens College on the occasion of its jubilee. It referred to a famous citizen of Manchester as "the experimental founder of the science of energy." May we not apply this royal phrase to the founder of this Church, or perhaps rather say that he was the experimental founder of the dynamics of love? And if we affirm that this is the only ultimately effective and efficacious method of coming into close and harmonious communion with God and man, who is there that can gainsay us? Some years ago I read in a Lenten sermon of Archdeacon Farrar's this passage, which simply and clearly states the indispensable conditions for any genuine and fruitful unity. "Of this we may be sure," he says, "that character, not creed, service, not form, is the test and the sole test which, alike in the Old and New Testaments, God invariably requires of us." Since these words were uttered has there been less consent to these conditions of common worship and common work? Has there not been an ever-increasing consent? Men are disposed to say in the words of Bossuet, that they feel their salvation "safer in God's hands than in their own"; that is an instinct which will prove more and more a mighty solvent of that apparently adamantine belief that only through a particular church and particular scheme is salvation attainable. Men are disposed to get at essentials in a more natural way. They ponder the actions and sayings of men at critical junctures. When Bossuet was approaching his end he wished to have the Lord's Prayer repeated to him again and again: "it included everything," he said. He is by no means singular in holding that view. And men are much more inclined to seek sometimes the children of Wisdom in their own nurseries, and to find that, indeed, Wisdom is justified of her children. John Leech once portrayed a scene in the nursery, and reported the words of the children. One of the two had just recently received a revelation from above, and said to his pugnacious brother, "Do you know, Freddy, that we are only made of dust?" "Are we?" said his companion, "then I'm sure we ought to be very careful how we pitch into each other so, for fear we might crumble each other all to pieces." Ay, God remembereth that we are dust, it is only we who are apt to forget it.

Brotherhood.

Now I can imagine someone at this point thinking of the Open Brotherhood, and asking do I, do we belong to it? Well, yes, if by that phrase with its superfluous adjective is meant a union or society of people related and conditioned by the exigencies of a meeting of the Master, for the Master, by the Master. For a church is a brotherhood that requires that one should go somewhere with someone to do something, and where even two or three may form a quorum to carry out the behests of Christ. But there seems to be a surmise that only the absolute and the unconditioned can be members of that fraternity. And if I remember anything of Dean Mansell and of the sweets of sweet philosophy the absolute and the unconditioned are the characteristics of only one person.

What "Unitarian" signifies.

There are two words of which I am neither afraid nor ashamed, the words "Church" and "Unitarian." In what sense I hold the first I have already broadly indicated. The second is to me simply the symbol of this ever-present community who, though not within the same walls, or within any limits of organisation are attracted by the life, aims, and work of Christ, moved by his motives, and striving in his spirit to further the work he began and in a very understandable sense also finished, it is a symbol to me of a community who can never sanction the growth of any religious system which should leave out the only spirit which can justify men's sway over each other in great organised forces—the spirit of love, in whose vocabulary the words compulsion and persecution are sought in vain. The word Unitarian is a symbol to me of these things; to others the same things may be symbolised by another word: we are coming gradually to understand that this is so.

Some years ago, nearly twenty, ere as yet the atom had taken another Protean shape and escaped, pursued by the hue and cry of the whole scientific world, and when science was worrying theologians with dreams of a new Theism, Bishop Phillips Brooks reviewed two famous doctrines in the light of the New Theism.

The doctrine of the Trinity (he said) is a protest againt the hard, tight personalness of the conception of God which thinks of Him as a big individual, with definite limits to His nature, and almost to a visible frame in which He lives. The doctrine of the Trinity is an attempt to give richness, variety, mystery, internal relation, abundance, and freedom to the ideas of God. Unitarianism has got the notion of God as tight and individual as it is possible to make it, and is dying of its meagre Deity.

The New Theism.

Now, considering the helpless play of every man's mind as it tries to grasp the conception of God, what God is in essence, this was a somewhat gratuitous deviation from that splendid magnanimity which was the Bishop's prevailing characteristic. However, "the new Theism," he continues, "filled with the sense of a divine life in the very being of the universe, furnished that bath of a great general conception into which special doctrine must now and then be plunged for the renewal of its truth and freshness." Well, we are left to the comforting inference that the bath that freshened the one doctrine drowned the other. I know not how the doctrine of the Trinity is faring, but certain it seems to me that the last vestiges of metaphysical futility have been washed clean away from the other, and the doctrine emerged pure and radiant in its simplicity in the words, "God is love," with the implication, no doubt, that He still is one, for any who prefer a barren, metaphysical statement to a fruitful religious conception. Like Paul hampered with his "body of this death," we are apt to exclaim, who will deliver us from this dead metaphysical name that enshrines the metaphysical conception of unity. Well, like St. Paul, we must be content to carry about what seems an encumbrance, till the miracle of deliverance happens, and thank God that things are no worse. The thing may be an offence to others, but it cannot but be the token to ourselves of our redemption. Perhaps, who knows, that other famous doctrine will, ere long, be regarded as a dead metaphysical conception from which those to whom it attaches itself, will rejoice to be rid, and the scattered elements of the great true church proclaim in unison "God is love," and, joining forces, labour, as never before, for the promotion of Peace on Earth and goodwill amongst men. It may chance to be a more excellent way out of the Trinitarian controversy than that subtle metaphysical way indicated by Dr. Martineau, that last immortal attempt to find unity through intellectual agreement. Metaphysics divides and rules; love unites and reigns.

They that love One Another.

In the Pagan world, when as yet there were but comparatively few Christians, and these were scattered and isolated, we are told that they picked each other out in pagan throngs by making a quiet sign of the cross. In these days, when it would be almost truer to say, as far as official Churchdom is concerned, how these Christians hate one another, rather than how they love one another, members of the Church I speak of, also far too scattered and isolated, as yet, for effective union, can pick each other out by a quiet sign of genuine Christian welcome. A name or a doctrine no longer creates a chill that freezes the genial current of the soul. They read, as it were, in each other's heart the words they have laid to heart and learnt by heart, "if I know all mysteries and all knowledge but have not love, I am nothing." Wherever they are, they are gradually changing the atmosphere of hate, which Mr. Charles Booth so strikingly refers to, into an atmosphere of love; they are changing mere toleration, which is, of course, a great gain, into that finer attitude in which men in honour prefer one another, they are the radiating centres of the constraining force of love, they are the doctors of the science of energy, whose experimental founder, author, and finisher was Christ. And when men think with gratitude of Christianity as the manifestation in men of holy desires, good counsels, and just works, they think, and cannot help thinking, of this ever-present Church, Christ-guided, inspired of God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed. It is our privilege and joy to proclaim these things freely in our group of churches, which have in their measure striven to live up to them. It is with fear and trembling we dare to think that we may have attained, here and there, or now and then, to be counted worthy of this Church triumphant, of this Church which when things seem at their worst and darkest, remembers with a smile the immortal story in the Old Testament of the Vintage of Abiezer, and of the select, elect three hundred, "faint, yet pursuing," and takes to heart the no less immortal story in the New Testament of the True Vine and the pruning and cleansing of the branches. These are days of a feverish propaganda. But a city set on a hill cannot be hid. The best propaganda is to set the City of God on a hill, that the ransomed of the Lord may see it, and come with singing unto Zion.

ARE there not aspirations in each heart
After a better, brighter world than this?
Longings for beings nobler in each part,
Things more exalted, steeped in deeper bliss?
Who gave us these? What are they? Soul, in thee
The bud is budding now for immortality.—

Robert Nicholl.

SERMONS AND PREACHERS: CONGREGATIONS AND HEARERS.

AT the outset, in the first part of this subject, we are confronted, on all hands, by the very frequent allegation that sermons are at a discount in these days, that they do not interest people, and, above all, that they do not "draw, somehow." It has not, indeed, been possible, for some time past, to read a newspaper, magazine, or periodical of any kind belonging to any one of the religious denominations without meeting the same complaint in one form or another; and, if we may judge at all by what we see and hear, we must conclude that our case is not better but, upon the whole, even worse than that of others.

Low Intellectual Standard.

Personally, I am quite prepared to accept the alleged depreciation of sermons thus sufficiently testified to, provided the alleged fact be taken not by itself, but along with almost endless kindred facts, all of which go to show, beyond doubt, that these very "advanced times" of ours bear equal witness to, at least, an equal depreciation of all the deepest intellectual, moral, and religious things. Let anyone, for instance, test the lower intellectual taste of the people at large by comparing the enormous number of volumes of fiction with the exceedingly small number of all other volumes, put together, taken out of our public libraries week by week, and then let him try to realise what it means in regard to common intellectual standards. So in regard to all the high-class dramas, as a rule, Shakespeare having, long since, spelt bankruptcy to such theatre managers as venture to persistently put him upon the boards. None the less is it so in regard to things moral and religious at large. The Sunday Lecture Society is now hardly ever heard of, if it be not indeed utterly extinct, and all owing to the same general intellectual and moral causes. The Ethical Societies of the day, moreover, whose distinction is not their ethics but their attempt to divorce ethics directly from theology and indirectly from religion, have made no stir, and their lecturers quite as utterly "fail to draw" as do the preachers of the old discarded theological and religious order. In just the same way and for the like reasons, the week-day, scientific lectures, highly paid for and finely equipped, which, a few years ago, drew such large audiences, are now as surely going out of fashion as, according to the common allegation, are Sunday sermons. Secularism, as an organised propaganda, without regard to its truths or its errors, has also failed quite as much from its being too intellectual as from the anti-theological demands which, as a matter of fact, it has made upon its adherents.

Sermons also Suffer.

With the enormous qualifications thus variously indicated, I, for one, am free to admit that there has indeed grown up in all our churches a lower estimate of sermons as such; but I insist on it that no one can judge of the admitted fact without duly considering, also, the kindred facts of the equally lowered estimate of great and good books, of great dramas, of high-class lectures, of noble ethical principles, of whole-hearted religion, and of all that seeks to carry the people beyond their physical sensations, or their imaginations, into the higher regions of mind, conscience, and God. These truly kindred phenomena must all be taken together, as having one common cause, whatever it be; and I cannot help thinking that he who should fully account for the one would also determine the explanation of the others. In other words, I think that whoever could find the cause and the cure for the growing lack of appreciation of really great books, of the best dramas, and of the best ethical work and thought, would also, at the same time, and in the same way, find both the cause and the cure for that lower estimate of sermons we hear so much of.

Maintain the Standard.

But what, meanwhile, are the preachers to do? Well, whatever else they do, they must guard, resolutely and constantly, against lowering their own standard, as to what the sermon essentially is, in so far as it reaches out towards its own true ideal. The logic of the lower estimate of their work in general with which we have been dealing might seem to be, "What is the good of reading so diligently, of thinking so hard, and of seeking, in all possible ways, to realise in your sermon the very best attainable, when there will be so few to hear your words, and when half of the few will not care overmuch either way?" But the preacher who yields to that Satanic logic, instead of fiercely saying to the tempter, "Get thee behind me, Satan. Thou art an offence to me!" is already in what John Ruskin would have called "an entirely damned state of soul." We poor preachers, God be thanked, are not exactly responsible for the likes and dislikes of our congregations, but we are responsible for the faithful discharge of our own duty. No scamping of the sermon, no avoidable crudeness or incompleteness in its composition, no sluggishness in the preaching of it should be so much as thought of, no matter what people may say, or leave unsaid, about it.

And Lift it Higher.

Let not preachers thus either justify or sanction the alleged lower estimate of their work in these days. Rather let them raise the sermonic standard than lower it, ever aiming at the good, the better, and the best, but, at the same time, making a clear distinction, both in theory and in practice, between the absolutely best and the relatively best. If the aim be to "draw the crowd," after the popular preacher fashion, why then the absolutely best would be relatively the worst, and vice versâ. If you look to the absolute standard, for instance, there are no published sermons in Christendom that can compare with Dr. Martineau's; but who among us, without the mention of the grand name of the original preacher, would dare to read half a dozen of them on consecutive Sundays, instead of preaching his own relatively and comparatively poor sermons, in the hope of thereby increasing his small congregation? All this shows the very great importance of our distinguishing as preachers between the absolute and the relative in our attempts to reach the highest standard possible to us in our preaching. I do not forget how hard it is always to make the distinction wisely and well, both in theory and in practice; but then, neither do I forget that our work, as preachers in general, is the hardest work true men can set themselves to do. I remember, also, in this connection, that there is a limit to the elastic adaptation to varying circumstances and conditions which such a distinction between the absolutely best and the relatively best inevitably calls for. Still, preachers, like other people, have to pay due heed to time and place, and to utilise the wide margin of choice thus left with them. The poorest hand at this greatest work, for instance, knows better than to either preach a funeral sermon at a wedding, or a sermon on what one of our great writers and thinkers once ignorantly and stupidly called "the niggardliness of Nature" at a Harvest Festival, or to do anything else so entirely wide of the mark in respect to the relative and the comparative, as distinguished from the absolute, in sermons. If we, who are preachers ourselves, could aim at both the absolutely and the relatively best at one and the same time, it would be better still, and best of all, in so far as mere aim goes, and it goes further than we often think.

On this whole question as to our attitude towards that alleged depreciation of the preacher's work which is only too well known to us, it is supremely important, in the attempt to maintain and raise our own proper standard, to remember that we ministers are preachers, whatever else we may be, or not be. That we are expected to be endless other things besides preachers, and to do endless other things besides preaching, goes without telling, and, when it is told, it is a melancholy record of bewilderments, distractions, trivialities, and grave ecclesiastical responsibility without the smallest ecclesiastical power. None the less, whoever forgets it, or seeks to force us to forget it, we ourselves must remember that we are pre-eminently called to be preachers.

The Hearers' Responsibility.

Passing on to the last part of my subject, "Congregations and Hearers," in their relation to "Sermons and Preachers," I regret that I have left myself too little space for its due and proportionate treatment as an important part of a very big subject. At the outset, under this head, it should never be forgotten that, just as really as sermons and preachers are always either making or marring congregations and hearers, so congregations and hearers are always, to an equal extent, either making or marring preachers and sermons. In the pages of THE INQUIRER, some time ago, the story was told of one of the few men who draw the crowd in these days, that he frankly "declared himself fortunate in having a large congregation to preach to, because he was sure he had not ability enough to preach to a small one." There is more in the story, whether true or not, than might easily appear to some people. Certain it is that if our congregations really want to make good preachers and good sermons impossible, they only need to persevere and persist in the notoriously bad attendances of many of them. Ministers in general will bear witness to the fact that one of the most grave hindrances amongst us to effective preaching is not merely the smallness of most of our congregations at best, but, still more, that so many of our few people do not attend anything more than a small percentage of the services of our own churches. One cannot grow eloquent or inspirational before empty seats, much less before empty seats that might be filled, and would be filled, if the sense of individual obligation and privilege were anything like as common in our church membership as it ought to be. If our congregations were to put their ministers on their mettle by doing their own best in the way of regular and appreciative hearing, they would soon find that their ministers were, reciprocally, putting them on their mettle, too, by loftier heights of thought, deeper depths of feeling, and fuller flows of healing influence.

The presumption always is that the true minister ever seeks to make the whole service of the House of God, hymn and prayer, reading and sermon, into one harmonious whole; but, without the co-operation not only of organist and choir but of regular and reverent hearers, this cannot be done. Nevertheless, wherever and whenever it is done, the great end of preaching, as of the whole service of which it is an essential part, in bringing both preachers and hearers nearer to God, and so nearer to each other, will be realised, and there will be less and less complaint both of poor preaching and of poor hearing. In mutual sympathy and co-operation, not in harsh criticism on the one side, nor in weak complaining on the other, lie our redemption and our renewal in this as in most other things.

W. MELLOR.

A CONGREGATIONAL MINISTER.

THE ranks of our ministry are recruited by men coming from many different churches. The reasons for the change from an orthodox to an unorthodox world are usually either a crisis in the minister's theological opinions or the gradual discovery that his beliefs have ceased to be in harmony with the faith of those among whom he has been ministering. According to temperament and circumstances, the transition is found to be easy or is passed through only with struggle and regret. But when the decisive step has been taken there is probably in all cases a feeling of relief, and of gratitude for the freer intellectual milieu in which the convert finds himself.

Gratitude does not yield place, but in course of time it is tempered with a more discriminating coolness. Comparisons present themselves. The old traditions are handled again with curiosity or a lingering fondness. Fragments at least of the ancient mode of thought and organisation are found to be admirable, though, it may be, not necessary for imitation. These reminiscences of the old, while they involve no suspicion of disloyalty to the new, may not be without interest for those to whom they can only come by way of report.

The position of the minister in a

Unitarian or other non-subscribing church is in many ways strangely different from that of the Congregational minister. It may be permitted to one who knows their churches from within, having been born into their communion, to hope that a sketch of the relations between minister and people among the Congregationalists will have some element of interest for the readers of the INQUIRER.

The minister is regarded as, under Christ, the president of the local society or church. Membership in these churches depends on a profession of faith, not indeed in any set form of words, but of faith in a living person, the Christ. The typical course of procedure is for the candidate to be visited by two of the deacons, the elected officers of the church, who question the young men or women—profession of faith among those of mature age is not unknown but is less frequent—admonish them, and offer serious advice as to the responsibilities of the Christian life. After this the deacons present their report at the monthly church meeting, and at the meeting next following the candidate is proposed for membership by a formal vote. The invitation is completed when the minister as representative of the church extends to the new member the right hand of fellowship. It is a simple ceremony but hauntingly impressive. This, which is the most significant moment for the individual, is one of the episodes in the life of the community which yields it its highest consciousness of Christian purpose. The leading actor in the religious drama is the minister. He also, in virtue of his office, administers the rite of baptism, presides at the Lord's Table, and, to pass to more mundane affairs, is in all matters of business the chairman of the society.

The pre-eminence thus accorded to one man may, if that man be weak, prompt him to over-lofty imaginings. If in practice this is rarely the case, it may follow from the other fact that he is, while the leader, yet a member of an extremely democratic society. He does not lack that frequent criticism which is, no doubt, valuable even if it may sometimes, in the minister's judgment, be misplaced.

There is still a custom, though it is now frequently dispensed with, of ordaining the minister by the laying on of hands by some of his older brethren. A service called one of ordination, whether rightly so termed or by an anachronism, is always held. The minister thus introduced, and holding in virtue of his office this leading position, is nevertheless brought into closer and more enduring relation to his people than is common in our churches. It is no part of the writer's purpose to proceed from this description to any discussion of the merits of the one system or the other. A single opinion, unless fortified by an argument which in this case would be lengthy, and might be balanced and inconclusive, is of little value. It would, indeed, seem rather to detract from whatever value or suggestiveness there may be in this slight exercise of the art of looking on the things of others, an art that is recommended to us on good authority.

UNITARIANISM IN THE METROPOLIS.

A STUDY OF THE FIGURES AND A SUGGESTION.

THE Daily News deserves the gratitude of all religious people for the very careful and impartial census of the London church-going population which it has now completed, under the superintendence of Mr. R. Mudie Smith. The book of results which is announced may be usefully studied in connection with Mr. Charles Booth's great work on the "Religious Influences" which bear upon the life and labour of the people of London.

The total population of Inner London is slightly under 4½ millions (4,470,304); and of these it was found that rather over one million attended Divine service, a ratio of one in 4·45. Of these, one-third attended church or chapel twice a day. Deducting, therefore, this proportion of "twicers," we get a total of Sunday worshippers (for Inner London) of about 850,000, a ratio of 1 in 5·55 of the population, or 16 per cent.

Of the million church-goers the Established Church claims 430,000, the Free Churches 416,000, Roman Catholicism 93,000, and "other services" (Jews, Spiritualists, Ethical Societies, &c.), 63,000. The total attendance at our 23 churches, chapels, and domestic missions in this great area of Inner London is 3,589.

If Outer London be added we get a total population for the whole metropolis of 6,248,983; and a total Sunday attendance at 31 Unitarian churches, chapels, and missions of exactly 4,317.

Here, then, we have figures which are undoubtedly reliable, by which we can test our numerical strength in Sunday worshippers. There are 3,328 of them in our chapels (2,649 adults, and 679 children under 15); and 989 in our seven domestic missions (405 adults and 584 children).

From the total of 4,317 given above, if we deduct the usual one-third for "twicers," there remain exactly 2,878 individual adherents, of whom some 2,000 are adults (i.e., over the age of 15 years).

This, it must be confessed, is a very small figure. It is no more than the reputed number of "ejected" clergy in 1662. If some figures recently given in the Christian Life are to be relied upon, it is less than the total of worshippers to be found in the six or eight Unitarian congregations in London in the early Victorian era.

It is often said that the count of heads at Sunday service is no fair measure of the strength or influence of a religious body. There is some truth in this. The people in some cases may, and undoubtedly do, "weigh" more than they "measure"—they count for more than their numerical value. We know some churches where this is true. There are some denominations, such as the Society of Friends, in which this is conspicuously the case. And most of us, I imagine, are familiar with an abundant amount of evidence that the influence of Unitarian thought is strong out of all proportion to the number of worshippers in Unitarian churches.

It would be rash, however, to press this argument too far, or to build too much upon it. "Adherents" who do not adhere (as someone put it the other day) are a doubtful element upon which to rely. In Mr. Charles Booth's recent book on Religious London he wrote: "As a religious body the Unitarians are small in numbers, and their numbers are still dwindling. . . . Their direct corporate influence on religious thought grows less rather than greater." Qua churches, is there not a measure of truth in that? And, if so, ought it not to set us all on the alert to devise some better methods?

One fact that clearly emerges from a study of the figures is that, except where there is a powerful organisation or a well-known and attractive preacher in the pulpit, church attendance is only satisfactory in the better-class residential suburbs.

Excluding Little Portland-street, there were only six of our London churches which were able to number 200 for the day (two services). These were Croydon (268), Wandsworth (251), Highgate (250), Newington-green (246), Kensington (211), and Hampstead (203). These are all comfortable residential districts in North, West, and South London. Next to these come Wood-green (162) and Lewisham (162), which are also residential suburbs. It is in these districts that (on our present lines) we appear to have the best chance of establishing live congregations.

It is not proposed in the present article to traverse all the ground of inference and suggestion covered by the Church Census. This will be done by degrees, as the figures become widely known, and their significance is realised. It is enough for the present if we can feel the demand they make upon us, both in the way of better methods and a more enthusiastic personal dedication, so that we may win a better and larger hearing for our gospel in this mighty centre of life and work, of pain, misery, and sin. It is no occasion for lamentation, for the figures of all the churches are bad, and ours, I daresay, are no worse than some of us expected. But, in view of the vast areas of London life still untouched by the ministrations of religion, it is an occasion for serious thought, consultation, and preparation for reform. The only thing which the figures do not allow us to do is to rest content with the present methods and results of our church polity, as though we were living in the best of all possible worlds. That would be folly.

I close with a practical suggestion, which I earnestly hope will be taken up, viz., that an impartial and weighty Committee of Inquiry be formed for the purpose of sifting and collating the evidence with regard to our church life in London; suggesting improved methods of management, co-ordination, and extension of work, and reporting upon the religious needs and opportunities of the Metropolis from the point of view of our Liberal Faith.

I would strongly recommend that the "official" element in this committee be a subordinate one; for it is our existing societies in London, as well as our chapels, whose work will form an important portion of the investigation of the Committee, and for this purpose its composition must be non-partisan, and free from the bias of existing controversies. * The large morning attendance at Little Portland Street Chapel was due to the attractive ministry of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke who preached during the six winter months of 1902-3. The regular congregation is small. The Chapel deserves credit for having placed its building and organisation at the disposal of this great preacher; thus helping forward the common cause of Liberal Religon in the heart of the Metropolis.

† The Morning Service at Newington Green is a Children's Service.

‡ The Evening Service at Richmond had not been resumed when the Census was taken.

§ Our Chapel at Walthamstow was omitted from the Daily News figures. The totals here given were supplied by a member of the congregation, and represent, I believe, the normal attendance.

‖ All Souls' Free Church, Finchley Road, was opened too recently to be included in the Census. I am very glad to hear that the Rev. E. Daplyn has made an excellent start with his new venture.

Association, the London and S.E. Provincial Assembly, the London District Unitarian Society, and the Domestic Mission Society might each nominate one member. These might co-opt five others, selected from the ministry and laity of our London churches. And a man in whom universal confidence would be felt, such as Professor Carpenter, might be asked to accept the position of chairman and convener. If a committee of such a character could be formed, I think that the whole of our churches throughout the country, as well as our London churches, would look with sympathy upon its labours, and would gain new life and new ideas from the results of its deliberations.

The religious needs of great cities can no longer be supplied by even the best-intentioned efforts of isolated individuals. Effectiveness can only be attained by co-operative effort, by the accumulation of resources (human and material) in the danger zones and difficult places, so that the dead-weight of indifference may be moved, the organised interests of worldliness confronted, and the forces of purity, truth, and brotherhood rallied and led to victory. Have we succeeded at present in doing this? Have we ever yet got London's ear for our message, or touched her heart? If not, cannot some forward move be devised by such a method as I have ventured to suggest?

London, Nov. 1903. H. S. PERRIS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Bell-street Mission.—The Rev. Sidney H. Street writes: "Christmas is now close at hand, and I have to make my first appeal to the friends of Bell-street Domestic Mission on behalf of our Christmas Fund and Poor's Purse. We are hoping to make the Christmas time a happy one for our Sunday-school children, and to do something to brighten the time for our older friends too. For this purpose we need money help. My Poor's Purse is also empty, and I am hoping that Christmas will refill it. May I also add a word of appeal on behalf of our regular evening class work, which is handicapped for the want of a small working fund. The physical culture classes entail a fee of £5, £2 of which is found by our Men's Club. Lantern lectures mean expense too, and our other classes and the juvenile clubs could all be improved by a small expenditure of money. Contributions for any of these purposes can be sent to me either to the Domestic Mission, Bell-street, Edgware-road, or to 4, Avenue-villas, Cricklewood-lane, N.W.

London (Bermondsey).—The scholars' annual party is to be held shortly after Christmas. Rev. Eustace Thompson (47, Upper Grange-road, Bermondsey, S.E.) begs to appeal for contributions towards the expenses of the party and the purchase of the usual gift books to scholars who have been regular in attendance. Mr. Thompson adds: "It may be a satisfaction to the generous people who send such contributions, that under the harmonious co-operation of the faithful teachers, a real improvement in the conduct of the scholars has been effected."

Birmingham (Balsall Heath).—On Wednesday, December 9, a "Social Evening" took place at the Council Schools, Tindal-street, in connection with "Our Father's Church," Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute. The business of a stall containing useful and fancy articles, most of which had been made at the ladies' sewing meetings, was part of the evening's entertainment, which included magic lantern, vocal and instrumental music, and dancing. There were about 140 persons present, and a net balance of nearly £12 in aid of the church funds was the result.

Dover.—A sale of useful clothing was held on December 9 and 10 at the Adrian-street Church, to aid the poor people living in the surrounding neighbourhood, all goods being sold at cost price. The sale, which was the result of the energy and zeal of the ladies of the sewing guild, was a great success. All the things being disposed of two hours before closing time.

Edinburgh.—The annual soirée of the St. Mark's congregation was held on Tuesday, December 15, in the University Hotel, and was well attended by the members and their friends. Rev. R. B. Drummond, who presided, said that he had lately read with no small satisfaction in Mr. Augustine Birrell's Essex Hall lecture, these words:—"It would be difficult to name a more emphatic Unitarian than Carlyle." He could not help wondering whether Mr. Birrel would have had the courage to say this to an audience of Presbyterians, and he thought if he said it to Carlyle himself, the sage would have slain him with a look! And yet it was quite true in a sense. Referring to Principal Story's speech on the Confession in the General Assembly, Mr. Drummond said it plainly showed that the tendency of thought in Scotland was towards those humane and more rational view of religion which were usually associated with Unitarianism. He did not look for any marked increase whether in the number of their churches or in the number of their adherents in Scotland, but the movement which was carrying men away from the superstitions of mediævalism would certainly go on, and they could only be faithful to their convictions and endeavour to keep an open corner of the Church universal for those who, while remaining within the lines of Christianity, refused to be bound by the creeds of the past, by whatever sophistries conformity might be defended. The Rev. James Forrest afterwards addressed the meeting. In the course of the evening an excellent programme of songs and recitations was gone through, and with the time-honoured custom of singing "Auld Lang Syne," a very pleasant meeting was brought to a close.

Exeter.—At George's Chapel, on Sunday morning, the Rev. T. W. Chignell, who that day entered on his 80th year, preached an eloquent sermon from the text: "Wisdom is justified of all her children."

Gateshead.—The Rev. Dendy Agate preached to a good congregation on Sunday morning, November 29, and lectured on the following evening on "Orthodoxy fifty years ago and to-day." A heavy snowstorm affected the attendance at the lecture. Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, of Newcastle, presided. Mr. Agate's visit was thoroughly appreciated. On Monday evening, December 7, the Rev. H. V. Mills gave the first of a course of three lectures on "Evolution," with lantern illustrations. There was an excellent audience. Mr. John Pattinson, of Gateshead, presided.

Leicester: Free Christian Church (Presentation).—On Tuesday evening, November 30, a social gathering of the congregation was held in the school-room to say "Farewell" to the Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., on his departure for Cardiff. There was a large number present. During the evening Mr. C. H. Roberts, chairman of the committee, presented to Mr. Whitaker, on behalf of the congregation, a very handsome writing table, with chair to match, made of fumed oak, as an expression of heartfelt thanks to Mr. Whitaker for his six years' ministry. On December 10 and 11, the annual sale of work, promoted by the ladies of the congregation, was held in the school-room. The sale was opened by Mrs. T. Fielding Johnson and Miss E. Gittins on the respective dates, and resulted in the net proceeds of £78.

Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Association.—A meeting was held on Wednesday evening, December 16, at the North End Domestic Mission, Bond-street, Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the chair, and the Rev. Joseph Anderson gave a stirring address, entitled "Strong Drink and Character." During the evening Miss Wells' choir rendered some excellent music. Mr. Hughes proposed and Mr. Haigh seconded a resolution, which was carried unanimously, protesting against the retrograde legislation on the subject of licences and magistrates' discretion promised by the Prime Minister. A similar resolution was passed at the Mill-street Domestic Mission on Monday, and has been sent to the local members, the Prime Minister, and Home Secretary.

Manchester District Association.—The monthly visit of the governing body was made last Saturday to Platt Chapel. Service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. C. T. Poynting and Rev. Ambrose Bennett preached an uplifting sermon on "Christian Zeal." The congregation numbered about 130. Tea was subsequently served in the Platt Chapel Sunday-schools, and was followed by a public meeting. The chair was taken by Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who, after an opening hymn, referred to the usefulness of the series of visits, and made known what must have come with surprise to many—that forty years ago the Association was enabled to put new life into the work at Platt. Mr. Poynting welcomed the visitors on behalf of the congregation, and suggested that much of the credit ascribed to the old Manchester District Unitarian Association was really due to their chairman, who joined Mr. Whitelegge in the ministry at Platt in 1864. Mr. T. E. Taylor followed with an earnest address. Rev. Priestley Prime spoke on "Truth and Reverence"; Mr Wm. Canning on "What I should like to see our Congregations becoming"; and Rev. H. Kelsey White on "The Joy and Privilege of our Common Work."

Manchester: Longsight.—On December 12 and 14 a very successful sale of work was held in the Gaskell Hall, its object being to raise funds for removing a deficit on the church accounts. About £75, the amount received, will go a long way to accomplish the desired object. The Rev. H. S. Dowson performed the opening ceremony on the first day, and Councillor D. Healey (of Heywood) on the second. Mr. Dowson spoke of the man the hall commemorated — William Gaskell—as his ideal of a Christian minister, and trusted that they who revered his memory would seek to enter into his spirit, and go on to achieve great results on behalf of the principles he had at heart.

Rochdale.—The annual sale of work held last week was opened on the first day by Councillor Stirling, and on the last by Lieut.-Colonel Pilcher, of Manchester. The event was in every way successful, and notwithstanding the bad trade in the town, the proceeds reached the record figure of £153.

Southport (Appointment).—The Rev. F. B. Mott, who recently returned to this, his native country, after years of ministry in America, the last ten of them at Dorchester, Mass., has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of the Portland-street Unitarian Church, in succession to the late Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved.

Torquay.—A series of lectures and concerts held fortnightly in Unity Hall was brought to a successful conclusion on Monday, Dec. 7. The series included two concerts, lectures by the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, on "English Surnames," Dr. Humphreys on "Insectivorous Plants," and a Shakesperean entertainment with lantern views and appropriate ballads arranged by Mr. W. Bathe.

Wick: South Wales.—The annual concert and entertainment was held on Wednesday, December 9, at the National School, kindly lent for the occasion. Rev. D. Rees presided. Rev W. J. Phillips Nottage exhibited lantern slides, illustrating "Jerusalem Past and Present," and members of the congregation and others rendered songs, recitations, &c. The building was packed, and the entertainment a complete success. The profits are to be handed over to the chapel funds.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THIS number of THE INQUIRER will reach some of our readers on Christmas Eve, others only later, but to all alike, the heartiest of good wishes! There are many things we should have been glad to say to our friends at this time, if it had not been that another call suddenly intervened. Now we must be content with a word of the sincerest thanks to all those who, during the past year, have done so much to enrich THE INQUIRER and to make it more widely known.

WE hope in the New Year for yet further progress; we hope to come into closer touch with the vital things of the religious life, through which alone our churches can be strong and fulfil their great task of ministry to the needs of men. And we ask of all friends a new measure of confidence and generous zeal in sustaining our efforts, that we may gather in fresh helpers, both to render our paper more effective and to ensure its more abundant use.

FOR three years after the Hague Conference Englishmen celebrated the festival of the Prince of Peace in the midst of war. Last Christmas peace had been restored. To-day there is still peace, but our Christmas festivities are held once more under the shadow of impending war. England, it is true, is not a principal in the Far Eastern dispute, and if war comes between Russia and Japan the conflagration may extend no further than the territories of the principals and the unfortunate subjects of the quarrel, China and Korea. But the treaty of alliance with Japan signed by the present British Government, by which they have bound us to go to Japan's assistance should she find herself at war with more than one foreign Power in the defence of the independence of China and Korea, gives us a very close and serious interest in the crisis.

APART altogether, however, from our own interest in the quarrel, the possibility of war between two Great Powers, one of them the very Power which initiated the Conference at the Hague, is bitter enough food for reflection at Christmas time. No one seems to expect that either party will seriously entertain the idea of submitting the merits of the dispute to the arbitration of the Hague Tribunal. The Hague Convention empowers any of the signatories to draw the attention of any other member of the Conference to the desirability of recourse to the Arbitration Tribunal; yet even this course seems hardly expected, unless it be from the United States Government, which, as was pointed out in these columns last week, has done more than any other Power to keep the little-remembered existence of the Tribunal before the public eye.

WHY will not Russia and Japan submit to arbitration the question of their future position in Manchuria and Korea? Why, if by chance they should elect, after all, to do so, will the conviction remain in the public mind that the step is intended only to gain time? It is because the two countries are believed to entertain settled ambitions which neither of them is regarded as likely to abandon, and which are wholly incompatible with each other. For ourselves, we are loath to believe that these ambitions will necessarily be adhered to by both nations to the point of war. We do not believe it to be beyond the scope of the world's diplomacy, and of sensible men having influence with the Governments concerned, to find a basis of compromise on which a permanent delimitation of "spheres of influence" may be raised which shall keep mutual jealousies henceforth within bounds.

TUESDAY'S Daily News announced a donation of £1,000 to the Macedonian Relief Fund, made by "A Friend" in Scotland to aid in securing another anonymous £1,000 offered if the whole fund reaches £20,000 by the end of the year. More than £17,500 has already been secured, so that there is still time.

THE Bishop of Worcester has literally carried out his expressed intention "to go to the limits of his power" in maintaining his views on the doctrine of the Virgin Birth. Mr. Beeby's resignation conferred on the Bishop the power to sequestrate the living. Departing from the usual custom in such cases, Dr. Gore made immediate use of that power. The situation is faintly reminiscent of that which followed Martineau's letter to his Dublin congregation in 1831. In each case the minister found himself suddenly and unexpectedly excluded from the pulpit. The Bishop did indeed offer Mr. Beeby the opportunity of saying farewell to his people, but the offer was accompanied by conditions which the vicar of Yardley Wood regarded as humiliating, and was forced to decline. Dr. Gore thereupon inhibited him from preaching or ministering in the diocese. Without reflecting upon the Bishop's action we share in the sympathy which is being widely expressed with the dispossessed clergyman. At the same time we cannot help contrasting Mr. Beeby's case with that of many Anglican ministers who, having come to a similar resolve without episcopal pressure, have been allowed to withdraw in unsympathetic silence from the Church which they hold dear.

THE Bishop of Manchester, preaching for the first time since his appointment to the Cathedral congregation, referred to the social problems of our time. The right attitude of the Church, he said, was that of earnest anticipation, not looking backward to tradition. We had to admit that there were in our great cities multitudes of families growing up in such conditions that we had no right to expect that they should live Christian lives. One man would solve the problem by clearing people out of the old rookeries, pulling down the houses, and taking the people into the country to work on the land or to the colonies. But the causes which produced overcrowding would not be removed by any such treatment. The same love of gain and the same craving after evil things that produced the housing problem would remain. Another man would preach to the people who lived in these wretched places the gospel of discontent, give them hopes of higher things, and endeavour to break up the present order of society. Yet, if things were shared more evenly, there would still be the same discontent. But if people could be persuaded that Christ was near them, they would not dare to make money by evil ways and they would not dare to live under evil conditions. Faith in Christ would bring out new hearts, and new hearts would bring out new surroundings.

As we published last week Professor Upton's letter to the Spectator on Mr. Craufurd's book, it is fair to make room for his response, which appeared in last week's Spectator:—

Sir,—As you have published in the Spectator of December 12, Mr. C. B. Upton's sharp attack on my little book called "Recollections of James Martineau," I hope that you will allow me to offer a brief explanation of the views which I have expressed. Mr. Upton attacks me for saying that there was a constant discord between Dr. Martineau's intellect and his heart or soul as regards religion. I wish to explain, that, in my opinion, this discord was not so much between Unitarianism and the requirements of spiritual religion as between a semi-Deistic form of Unitarianism and those requirements. Professor A. Seth Pringle Pattison has clearly shown that a very large amount of Deism remained to the end in Martineau's philosophy, and I have tried to show that a very large amount also lingered in his religious system. Hence arose inevitable internal discord. Some degree of this discord must always be found in a man who is at once a rationalist and a mystic, as I believe that Martineau was. No permanent and entirely satisfying concordat can be established between the rationalistic and the mystical elements of our nature. Martineau's mind and soul were perhaps not more radically discordant than those of Pascal. I agree with Mr. Upton in thinking that, on the whole, the conception of God as unipersonal satisfied Martineau's intellect even to the end, and that so he never wavered in his speculative Unitarianism. But I believe also that in his more devotional moods he admitted ideas and feelings which could scarcely be reconciled with this austere Unitarianism. Hence the internal — though perhaps for the most part unconscious — discord of which I have ventured to speak. That Martineau was to a great extent dissatisfied with all current forms of Unitarian religion is, I think, evident from his expressed conviction—recorded in his "Life and Letters"—that the best future of liberal religion in this country is more likely to be with the Congregationalists and the Presbyterians than with the Unitarians. Why should he speak thus unless he had some dim and half-conscious feeling that the practical deficiencies of Unitarianism are incurable? The secession from Unitarianism of his great friend Mr. R. H. Hutton must have tended to increase this feeling; for he writes thus of him in a letter to me published in my new book: "So entire was my trust in his religious intuitions that it went hard with me to abide by my own when they were unshared by him."—I am, Sir, &c., A. H. Craufurd.

Onslow House, Tunbridge Wells.

With regard to this letter much might be said, and we advise interested readers to look up the references in the "Life and Letters" to Unitarianism and Congregationalists. Here we must be content to say that, in our opinion, Mr. Craufurd has not succeeded in showing that "a very large amount of Deism" lingered in Martineau's religion.

We become heavenly-minded by living to make others happy. If it is the aim and work of your life to be a blessing to others, you are living already the heavenly life; and you will be only more openly and visibly in heaven when death wakes you to its scenery and surroundings. E. H. Sears.

AFTERMATH.

BY MARION E. PICKERING.

(From the Christian Register.)

To the mother who has passed the meridian of life there come many moments of quiet retrospection. Her children have reached maturity, and are no longer wholly dependent upon her loving care. Perchance the wide-awake, mischievous lad, who for many years has been at once her pride and her chief anxiety, has developed into a steady-going physician or an ambitious young lawyer. Perhaps the cherished daughters have transferred the sunshine of their presence to households of their own. Her strenuous life is over. Involuntarily, she pauses midway for a contemplative glance backwards, before her feet trend to the quiet slopes of the path towards the sunset.

If her children "rise up and call her blessed," she is conscious of no self-gratulation on the superiority of her judgment or the success of her training. Instead she is thrilled with inexpressible thankfulness that, despite her weaknesses, her uncertainties, and her successive mistakes, an over-ruling Providence has guided her loved ones to the attainment of a worthy manhood and womanhood.

Her heart goes out in warmest sympathy to all young mothers alive with enthusiasm, and conscientiously striving for the highest ideals in the child-life of their little ones. She does not feel competent to offer advice: her suggestions would be purely negative. She would fain set up little finger-posts along the road which would serve to indicate a more direct course to the goal than she herself has traversed.

"'Dangerous passing.' This road leads straight to a quagmire where I floundered," or "I shunned this path, influenced by pride or prejudice or fear or opposition. Others have proved that it is safe and delightful for childish feet."

"This road is circuitous, and my own little ones oft grew weary. There is a short cut, across lots, farther on."

Looking backward to the stress and whirr and hum of the busy years of her early married life, how readily the middle-aged mother can pick out the "white days"! They were not the days when over-much frilling and tucking were accomplished, or when remarkable achievements in housewifery astonished the neighbours. But there were delightful little expeditions to the piece-bag in the attic, "shopping for dolly," to the music of dancing feet and eager, prattling tongues. The mending-basket was shoved aside, not only patiently, but whole-heartedly, while dolly's new dress for Thanksgiving was enthusiastically planned, and seams and hems made ready for dear, blundering little fingers. There was plenty of time in the very midst of the big ironing to join in the jubilation over the result of the mimic ball game in the school yard, when, "I tell you, we fellows beat 'em all to nothing."

Miss Sarah Arnold, that wonderful woman with the heart of a child, tells a charming story of a hard-worked mother living on a farm in Maine. There were nine children in the family, and during the busy summer months many extra farm hands were employed, for whom she must provide. But, invariably, two days were set apart as sacred to the children. The home table was spread with cold meat and vegetables for the hungry men, and the mother took her little flock to the woods to spend long happy hours close to the heart of Nature. One of those daughters, now an elderly woman, recalls being awakened in the early dawn by her mother's low voice as she bent over her bed: "Put on your rubber boots, and come with me. I want you to hear the thrushes sing!" Miss Arnold adds, "What a beautiful memory to bequeath to a little child!" God's sunshine, birds, flowers, and a mother's love suffice to fill any childish heart with rapture.

Were the elderly mother to retrace her steps, she would not allow her keen sense of justice to delude her into minute measurements and comparisons in her dealing with her little ones. If Johnnie's knife chanced to have three blades and Charlie's but two, she would not equalise matters with nervous haste. She would improve the opportunity to instil the grand lesson of rejoicing in another's gain in Charlie's heart, and Johnnie should by no means plume himself on his advantage. Then, in her own time and way, she would reverse the lessons; but there should be no obvious "making up." This would be her "short cut, across lots."

Again, without abating one jot of her watchful care, she would not worry overmuch concerning childish foibles and misdemeanours. She has beheld the wonders of development. Like the apostle of old, when her little lad became a man, he put away childish things.

Although the period of her greatest activity is past, she now enters on a no less important stage in her career. Now comes her grand opportunity for the exercise of the most exquisite tact and the formation of the noblest friendships. She will gracefully lay down her sceptre as ruler and dictator, whether her son and daughters remain with her in the old homestead or have established homes of their own. She will frankly admit their right to their own opinions, decisions, plans, mistakes, and loves. She will always be "alongside," a loving, helpful friend, ready, when consulted, with the wise counsel of experience; but she will delicately refrain from obtruding her advice unasked. She will endeavour to transform the crown of rue of the traditional mother-in-law into a halo. Surely, there is no more beautiful relationship on earth than the motherhood that assumes the guise of a tender, sisterly love with advancing years.

What a revelation is the child-life of her grandchildren! So often the blessed little children are born into the midst of a scurry and a worry, a wild scramble for a foothold somewhere, a scrimping and a striving, a "paying off the mortgage," maybe, or "a pulling down the barns to build greater." The crown of motherhood presses upon brows knitted with care and chequered with anxiety. The glory of the coronation pales and fades away unheeded. Motherhood, perforce, takes the second place. It becomes dwarfed, stunted, and crowded into corners. Ah, the pity of it! But, after the sowing and reaping and the harvesting the Lord graciously sends, even unto these, the late, mellow Indian summer of grandmotherhood.

AN IRISH CARPENTER.

BY MARY RALPH.

HE was "a hard-grown little ould graft." In plain English he was clean-shaven, small of stature, and deeply pock-marked. His vocation in life had been that of workhouse carpenter. Day by day for more than a generation he had gone to and fro to "the big house," to make pauper coffins of regulation sizes to a regulation pattern; and, for variety, he did the simple repairs necessary to the doors and windows of the great rambling, echoing, half-untenanted group of buildings.

In my first recollections of him I see myself, as a small child, sitting by Willie Connors' fire in the carpenter's shed. No Palace of Art which I have since read about ever gave those who possessed it or dreamed it half the delight that shed gave to my brothers and sisters and me in our early days.

Stepping across the floor you were ankle deep in billowy shavings, clean, fresh, and sweet smelling, and only a child knows the suggestiveness and possibilities of shavings. Then there was always a fire on the hearth—not a big repellent fire from which you were screened off or ordered away, but one dull and smoking, capable of being brightened by surreptitious sticks and shavings, and indeed, of a cheering blaze in cold weather, when a generous armful of stuff, swept up and thrown on it, was fanned by an ancient bellows—and you were allowed to use that bellows. On the fire was nearly always a glue-pot; and never did knight or maiden of romance hang over a witch's pipkin with livelier hopes or more enthralling yearnings than we felt as we listened to the water bubbling in the outer case of that pot, and thought of the liquid usefulness within.

Away from the fire, by the long window glazed with tiny overlapping bits of glass, stood the carpenter's table, mysteriously scored and indented. Above it hung the wonderful tools which only men could use, but on the table lay seductively a hammer fit for childish hands, an oblong box of nails which never grew empty, and the squares and bits of wood which made the other things a joy in life.

It was always a pleasure to go to the workhouse in those days. We enjoyed the matron's bread and butter and raspberry jam. We were not impervious to the voluble flattery of the portress. The boardroom, with a creepy winding stair at its further end, its prodigious table and huge rolling map, inspired us with awe. The office, over which my father ruled supreme, was rich in red tape, quill pens, monster empty ink jars, and other flotsam and jetsam. But the culmination of every visit was to dash into the shed where Willie Connors worked. There we toasted our toes, frozen in the long stone passage, and there we laboured at dolls' tables, chairs, cradles, ships and boats, till whoever had brought us to the workhouse was ready to take us home again. When we failed in our task it was wonderful how our old friend used to succeed. Four nails and a bit of wood became a table instantly by his simple magic, and a cart grew into rumbling capacity as if at the mere sight of his hammer.

Sometimes he was too busy to help us, but he was never too busy to let us watch him at work, and that in itself was a fascination. That his pencil was flat and made broad marks, while ours (in the brief moments when we had any) were round, and made little or no mark at all, lent a charming variety to the nature of things. That he should measure and re-measure long after we were sure the line was straight was quite after the manner of grown-ups, who worried you about the correct words when you said your hymn and your "Questions on Common Things." But when pencil and tee-square had done their part, then came the sawing and planing, and Willie's tongue was free to continue his disquisitions on moral philosophy adapted to children of tender years.

In my visits to workhouses in later life I have felt that chill want of a dominant, vivifying, uniting soul which philanthropists tell us they also miss in "the house which is never a home." And I have wondered sub-consciously, whether its absence was not due to the want of a carpenter's shed, a fire, a glue-pot, and a Willie Connors!

He felt a perennial gratitude to my father for some great service done in days gone by, and it was his custom to call in at our house on his way home from work in the evening to ask if anything wanted a carpenter's mending. Whatever it might be, it was put right at once, so far as his skill availed. When no repairs were needed he would stand for a little while, with his back to the kitchen dresser, discoursing in a somewhat consequential way on varied topics to all comers. From Gerald Griffin's novels to the politics of "the (work) House," and from the American Civil War to the ferocity of Timothy Ryan's turkey "gobbler," nothing came amiss to him.

One thing only about Willie always puzzled us children. He never could be persuaded (and, indeed, by our parents, who knew his reasons, was never asked) to a meal in our house. His visits to us went on for years and years. They were so much a matter of course that, bachelor though he was, not the vainest or most feather-headed servant ever imagined they had any reference to her. And though he was sociable and even gay at times, after the manner of his countrymen, he was like them in a capacity for profound reserve, and like their tradition, too, in this, that he never uttered a word which could sully the mind of child or woman. When we were away he was told of our letters and our welfare just as we told our old nurse Biddy; when we came home again we hardly felt that we had settled in until we had seen Willie Connors.

At last, one Christmas time, I returned after an absence of several years, and was told that Willie Connors was ill and unable to leave the house. It could only remain therefore that, as soon as I could, I should go and see him.

Many were the exclamations of delight at my appearance, of gratification at my visit, and of thanks for the little tokens from all of us which I laid on the table. He hobbled across the room to place a chair for me, and I sat opposite to him on the hearth.

"Sure, Miss Julia, the sight of ye is good for sore eyes," he said, "An' how's every inch of ye? And how's Himself? Did he come with ye? It's 'think of an angel and she appears' with me to-night, for me mind was full of ye, and wishing above all that ye were comin' home for Christmas."

I briefly explained the sudden circumstance which enabled me and Himself (anglice, my husband) to revisit the old home just then; and said how very sorry I was to find him (Willie) so weak and poorly.

"Is it me being wake?" said he cheerfully. "Ah, sure what does that matter? If it isn't one thing it's another in this life. I wouldn't mind at all, only for something that ketches me here," putting his hand on his heart. "We must all have our share. But Miss Julia—ma'am, I mane and I ask yer pardon—I prayed the Lord that I might see ye once more before I died, for I want to ask ye to do something for me."

"I cannot hear any talk of your dying," I answered, "but you know that anything I can do for you, Willie, it will be a pleasure to do."

"Shure, I knew that same," he said; and for a few moments was silent.

I gazed into the fire, and wondered what it was the old man had to ask. The rain beat against the little window and spattered on the fire down the wide chimney. The wind howled away down the long street. The cabin was unchanged since I had last seen it. Perhaps the rafters were a deeper black, the pictures cut from illustrated papers a mellower tint, but the gleam of the firelight softened everything.

At last Willie spoke, slowly and quietly.

"What I am going to tell ye now, ma'am, I've never mintioned before to man nor mortal. This is Christmas Eve, and forty years ago this night I grew an ould man, and I've never been young since. Did ye ever hear tell me father used to dhrink?"

I shook my head.

"Well, he did, poor fella, and cruel hard times me poor mother used to have with him sometimes. She was a'most starved, the poor broken-hearted crather. A more uncomplainin' poor thing——! Well, God rest her sowl. She's an angel in heaven this many a day. I'd shoot meself," he went on with unexpected energy, "before ever I'd tie a woman to me and then give her cowld and hunger and ill-tratement. It was little I ever could give anybody at the best, but at least they wouldn't get that. So as soon as ever Father Mathew came into this place I took the pledge from him. And I had that terror of the dhrink in me that I locked and double-locked the doors agen it, as ye may say; for I made a vow in me own mind that I'd never take bite nor sup in anybody's house except me own, for fear I'd be timpted to brake that pledge. And all the more so as I was going coortin' the very same time."

He paused, partly out of breath, partly because memory had wrapt him away. Once more I marvelled over the power of love. The lines in the old face softened, the eyes beamed; he looked almost young. Across a gulf of forty years he was seeing the vision which opens heaven;

"If ye saw the girl I did it for," Willie resumed presently, "ye wouldn't wondher at anything that I did. She was—ah, Miss Julia, I can't tell ye what she was; but there never was her likes in this world since—to me anyway. She had two eyes like sloes in her head, and she was tall and slim, and a turn to her head ——! Me mother was dead be that time, and I was free to marry if I could get anyone to take me. So sometimes of a night I'd dhrop in to Kitty Whelan's, and one and another 'ud turn in, for all the bhoys was cracked about her, and we'd have a dance, or, maybe, some divarsion. She put her 'comehether' on everyone she came across. I dunno could I ever have had the face to ask her to marry me—and yet, sometimes she'd give me a look. . . .

"Well, at all events one Christmas Eve night me and a lot more was at the Whelans' house. When I passed the time of day with Kitty she was as mild as new milk, and very plazin to me. I dunno what was in her mind that night. They had a fiddler there, and plenty to ate and dhrink, and for a long while I got on all right without anyone passin' any remarks that I was taking nothing.

"But there was them in it, I well knew, wanted to get shut of me, so they, at last, made out to Kitty and her parents that I was slighting the good dhrink and vittles, and wouldn't take it inside me lips.

"'What's bacon to him?' sez one, 'or whisky ayther? It's turkey he wants, and old port, if ye plaze.' And wanted to know was it a bit of the breast I'd like, and all such gibberish as that. Kitty's father was always short-tempered, and I suppose he'd been mixing the punch. Anyway, he couldn't see further through a deal board than a pencil 'ud go, so he ups and sez, 'Be this and be that he'd see who'd have the conassurance to turn up their noses at what he offered 'em.' And with that he gev us the health of his daughter, Kitty. 'And every one of ye,' sez he, 'that is a man and not an ownshuck will dhrink that.'

"Ye might have shot me, that minit, and welcome. Kitty and one and another came round me, and was for putting the mug of punch in me hand. And Kitty said, 'Ah, Willie, don't be such an omadhaun! Ye'll set me father agen ye, and then what'll you do? Take a thimbleful, agra, and don't be such an ijot all out.' Now, I dunno, can I make plain to you me meaning? As I stood there, with them jeerin', and I taking tight hoult of me hands behind me back, and the smell of the punch under me nose, and Kitty looking beseeching at me, the crather, there came to me in an instant of time the thought of how one Christmas, when I was a little chap, me mother and I crep' down, sore and hungry, to the chapel, and knelt be the little moss-covered cradle where they had the child Jasus. Shure it was no more than truth what Father Mathew tould us, that dhrink blighted the little children worst of all, and that Jasus was sad in his mother's arms on account of them. All I know is the good Lord kep' me steady. . . .

"I broke out of the house at last, and walked the roads till daybreak. 'Twas well it wasn't like this, but a fine moonlight night.

"Am I sorry for it now? The not a bit. No; forty years clears up many things. Kitty Whelan married a snug farmer, and for long she was better off than I could have made her; and I wasn't dog in the manger enough to be sorry for that. And before the year was out me brother-in-law died, and me sister, Peggy, was threwn on the world with three little children. Then I knew that the Lord had made me heart tinder with me own troubles that I might feel for her, and also that was why the thoughts of the children came to me that night. So I took her and them in here, and they all turned out well, and I always had somebody to come home to till Peggy died last year. I usen't to want the children ever to grow up, they were such doaty little things; but unless I 'put a stone on their heads' I couldn't keep them from growing, how could I?

"But now Miss—ma'am, I mane—och, musha, sure I do be thinking of the old days—what I want to ask ye to do is this: Kitty Whelan—Maher was her husband's name—is in the workhouse. Aye, she is. I dunno what happened her. I misdoubt me he dhrank. Anyway, they lost all, and he's gone this long time. What I want you to do is to lift that stone out—mind ye don't scorch yer frock—and ye'll find a little bit of money in a weeny box."

I took out a couple of sovereigns and some odd silver and coppers.

"Will ye keep care of that for me, Miss Julia, and while ever it lasts will ye buy a little tay and sugar every week and let her have it. Sure yer mamma 'ud do it when ye're away. I thried hard to scrape together enough to berry her in the chapel yard, where everyone belonging to her is berrid. But Peggy was a long time very bad, and I got behindhand. At any rate, she never wanted for a pinch of tay, the crather, an' I'd be long sorry to think ever she should be parchin' for a drop and her not to have it. Maybe she'd think, or find out. . . .

"Ah no, ma'am, I'll never go to the workhouse agen. I know me time is short. But I don't mind now I seen ye, and had yer promise. Sure it never was anything but the greatest kindness I ever had from any of yer family. And ye'll give my love to them. . . ."

I sat with him little longer, and we talked of my brothers and sisters far away, and other people. Then the storm lulled, and I went home.

Within a week Kitty Whelan died, and her faithful old lover carried out his wish as to her funeral. It was his last care, and not many days after he also was at rest. Now his grave is not far from hers in the quiet burial-ground on the hill side.

To be famous, depends on some fortuities; to be rich, depends upon birth or luck; to be intellectually eminent may depend on the appointment of Providence; but to be a man, in the sense of substance, depends solely on one's own noble ambition and determination to live in contact with God's open atmosphere of truth and right, from which all true manliness is inspired and fed.—*T. CHRISTMAS IN OLD GUERNSEY.

THE Celtic spirit, full of mystery and loveliness, breathes through the stories and legends of Guernsey and Sark. Sometimes a touch alters a picture; so it is with this Celtic glamour, which casts a special beauty over superstitions that the Channel Islands share, perhaps, with England, as to mere story or detail.

A certain old Guernsey custom, called La Longue Veille, and kept up on December 23, took its rise in the days when the islanders knitted all kinds of woollen things for sale at home and abroad. In the times of the Tudors and Mary Stuart, Guernsey woollen stockings fetched a high price in England, and were to be found in more than one royal wardrobe. Both men and women knitted during those days of woollen trade. While the fisherman waited for the turn of the tide, and the farmer's wife rode to market, her paniers of butter and vegetables slung on each side of her horse, they both knitted busily at "guernseys," stockings, "jerseys," or gloves.

But on December 23, a "woollen" festival was held. At some noted farmhouse, a goodly company of men and women gathered together to finish off and pack up woollen goods which were to be sold next day at a special market in the little capital of Guernsey. Masters and servants met together, and neighbours joined in preparations for this "long night" festival. The company assembled in the raftered kitchen, where a well-stored rack hung from the poutre or centre beam. Across one side of the kitchen stretched the wide hearth, with its big, open chimney, ornamented with weird carvings. Here, resting their feet on the raised hearthstone, and seated on stools, were the old men, who chatted of their boyhood's days in the dark recess of the chimney. Warming their hands at the vraic fire, they kept watchful eyes on the trepied, where kettles sang in anticipation of supper. In the other side of the chimney enclosure was the large oven used for baking bread and cake; and heated by setting fire to the dried furze in its interior.

The mothers and wives sat on the jonquière in a warm corner near the hearth. It was the sofa—and is the sofa still—of Guernsey farmhouses. It is a wooden frame, a few feet from the ground, and is now filled with dried fern; but in the olden days it was filled with rushes. Its green baize cover and heap of pillows give it the homeliest air of comfort.

The young men and the girls sat on the floor and knitted by the light of the crâsset, which had been pulled along a cord to a point above their heads; there it hung, filled with oil, and casting a dim light over golden and dark heads, and throwing mysterious shadows over beautiful fair faces and into sea-blue eyes. Wild sweet songs were sung as the knitting needles flashed, and blood-curdling tales came from the hearth corners, where the old men sat.

Pushed into the background was the long table and forms; behind the door ticked the eight-day clock; but very much in evidence was the beautiful old carved chest, which, long ago, had held the bride's dower of linen, the bride who sat on the jonquière, now a rosy hale old grandmère. The clean sand strewing the floor sparkled like silver in the fire-light. And all went "merry as a marriage bell" till the work was finished and packed up. Then there was a stretching of limbs, and a clatter of tongues while the long table was pulled forward and spread for supper with mulled wine, "spiced and sweetened," cheese and galettes, or "Guernsey biscuits." The wine was always served in coffee cups.

Supper over, and perhaps an impromptu dance, the company separated, to meet in the market the next day, Surveille, or Christmas Eve, which itself was woven round with legend and mystic rites. People returning home have been led to the far end of the island by the "faeu Bellengier"—the will o' the wisp. Large black dogs and white rabbits dogged the path of belated people and proved their uncanny origin by refusing to be driven off.

At midnight, on Christmas Eve, it was believed that all water turned to wine. The story goes that a curious woman, at midnight, went to draw water from the well. All at once she heard a voice crying—

Toute l'eau se tourne en vin
Et tu es proche de ta fin.

She fell to the ground, seized by sudden illness, and before the end of the year she died.

In Sark, like superstitions held sway in olden days; but now, in both islands, old ways and old customs and beliefs are dying out. Christmas is now kept in English fashion with holly decorations, Christmas trees and Christmas parties. It is doubtless good to get rid of superstitions; but it is a pity that the Celtic glamour is fast dying out of the Channel Isles; and that the spirit of modernity rules, with but here and there a hidden tale, a secret old-way belief, to leaven the lump of matter of fact.

G. GALLIENNE-ROBIN.

THE dearth of clergy in the Church of England was the subject of an important address by the new Bishop of Manchester (Dr. Knox) a few days ago. The first cry that came to him, he said, from his diocese, was a bitter complaint of the need of help. There were men working single-handed among 10,000 people, who simply could not find a curate, though they had been trying for years. There were, in his opinion, two main reasons for this sad state of things. The first was (we paraphrase a lengthy utterance) the apathy of Church people. The Church was the only denomination in this country which did not undertake to train and support young candidates up to the moment of their ordination. The second was their timidity in face of scientific discovery. They were afraid lest the advance of study should undermine the foundations of the faith. The remedy for this state of mind was to be found, he thought, in a combination of earnest scientific and theological studies.

DEGREES infinite there must always be, but the weakest among us has a gift, however seemingly trivial, which is peculiar to him, and which, worthily used, will be a gift also to his race for ever.—John Ruskin.

MORLEY'S GLADSTONE*.

[CONCLUDING NOTICE.†]

WE return once more to these volumes at the end of the year, of which their publication was one of the great events. The purpose of this concluding notice is not to enter into any further details, or to offer any criticisms, of this record of a marvellous career, but simply to renew the deep impression made by Mr. Morley's work, for which the people of this country cannot be too grateful, as a worthy memorial of the life and character of one of the greatest and noblest of Englishmen.

It was on May 19, 1898, that Gladstone died. On the following day in both Houses of Parliament tributes were paid, of which Mr. Morley quotes that of Lord Salisbury, as thought by most to go nearest to the core of the solemnity. "What he sought were the attainments of great ideals, and, whether they were based on sound convictions or not, they could have issued from nothing but the greatest and the purest moral aspirations"—so the Prime Minister bore his earnest testimony. "He will leave behind him the memory of a great Christian statesman. Set up necessarily on high, the sight of his character, his motives, and his intentions would strike all the world. They will have left a deep and most salutary influence on the political thought and the social thought of the generation in which he lived, and he will be long remembered not so much for the causes in which he was engaged or the political projects which he favoured, but as a great example, to which history hardly furnishes a parallel, of a great Christian man."

As the long history of his career is unfolded, closely interwoven as it was with the history of his country, this is what constantly emerges, and most clearly in the most trying passages of his life. A man of marvellous gifts, that is what we feel throughout, but even more, a man of unsullied life and of the noblest aspirations. The splendid orator, the master of finance, the fearless leader, the indomitable labourer for his country's good, the ardent friend of the liberties of down-trodden peoples, we see him following his steadfast course amid all outward changes, generous, humble-minded and devout, with the true humility of a reverent faith, yet stern and eager in a passionate loyalty to the great principles and ideals of righteousness, truth, honour, and humanity, which were the foundation and the constant inspiration of his life.

The first distinct utterance of that voice, which became so potent in upholding the true national and international ideal, Mr. Morley finds in 1850, in the debate on the Don Pacifico incident, when Lord Palmerston had treated Greece with scant consideration, taking a course which Peel described as consistent neither with the dignity nor the honour of England. Gladstone was on the same side, and of his speech Mr. Morley says:—

> Now for the first time he made the appeal, so often repeated by him, to the common sentiment of the civilised world, to the general and fixed convictions of mankind, to the principles of brotherhood among nations, to their sacred independence, to the equality in their rights of the weak with the strong. Such was his language. "When we are asking for the maintenance of the rights that belong to our fellow-subjects resident in Greece," he said, "let us do as we would be done by; let us pay all respect to a feeble State and to the infancy of free institutions, which we should desire and should exact from others towards authority and strength." Mr. Gladstone had not read history for nothing, he was not a Christian for nothing. (I., p. 370.)

In the following year came his public exposure of the horrors of the Neapolitan prisons and the ardent appeal on behalf of liberty and justice that went with it. Six years later, speaking against Palmerston on a vote of censure moved by Cobden, with reference to the China war, he took the same ground of natural justice—"that justice which binds man to man; which is older than Christianity; because it was in the world before Christianity; which is broader than Christianity, because it extends to the world beyond Christianity; and which underlies Christianity, for Christianity itself appeals to it."

From those earlier days we come down to the great Midlothian campaign, with its passionate appeal on behalf of Bulgaria, and not less on behalf of the honour of this country. It is the same in the long course of Gladstone's labours on behalf of Ireland, and in a different field, but as clearly, in the Bradlaugh debates, and in regard both to Egypt and the Transvaal, and finally in his last public appeal on behalf of Armenia. On all these questions there were sharp differences of opinion, and Gladstone suffered much unpopularity and obloquy; but as one reads Mr. Morley's narrative, and especially in the third volume, where he is telling of what he himself lived through with his great leader, the impression grows ever stronger and more clear, that however judgments may be divided, Gladstone throughout was true to the loftiest ideal, that he was working and spending his life, not in self-seeking, but with steadfast aim to serve his country and the cause of humanity, truth, and right.

There were always those who recognised his essential nobleness of aim. Thus Mr. Morley quotes the famous fighting bishop, Phillpotts of Exeter, who wrote to Gladstone on Christmas day, 1863:—

> A Christian statesman is a rare object of reverence and honour. Such I entirely believe you are. I often remember the early days of my first intercourse with you. Your high principles gave an early dignity to your youth, and promised the splendid earthly career which you are fulfilling. I shall not live to witness that fulfilment. (II., p. 530.)

Five years later Francis Newman wrote to him of "warm admiration, deep sympathy, fervent hope, longing expectation of lasting natural blessing," with which he and "many thousands of warm and simple hearts" looked to Gladstone's certain elevation to high responsibility. "In the moral power which you wield," he added, "go on to elevate and purify public life, and we shall all bless you, dear sir, as a regenerator of England."

Then, in 1877, J. R. Green, the historian, described his first meeting with Gladstone, "his charming abandon of conversation, his unaffected modesty, his warm ardour for all that is noble and good."

I felt so proud of my leader—the chief I have always clung to through good report and ill report—because, wise or unwise as he might seem in this or that, he was always noble of soul. . . . I wish you could have seen with what a glow he spoke of the Montenegrins and their struggle for freedom; how he called on us who wrote history to write what we could of that long fight for liberty! And all through the evening not a word to recall his greatness among us, simple, natural, an equal among his equals, listening to everyone, drawing out everyone, with a force and a modesty that touched us more than all his power. (II., p. 561.)

So, also, Spurgeon wrote, in 1882: "You do not know how those of us regard you, who feel it a joy to live when a Premier believes in righteousness. We believe in no man's infallibility, but it is restful to be sure of one man's integrity."

Mr. Morley himself has offered a very noble tribute to his chief, and especially in the whole record of the third volume. There is something tragic in the close of the great statesman's career, the failure of his last efforts on behalf of Ireland; and yet, as one reads it is as in the loftiest tragedies, one sees the imperishable elements of a noble manhood, even amid suffering and bitter disappointment, "cast down but not destroyed" in unshaken loyalty to the Highest Good. We cannot refrain from quoting Mr. Morley's account of the article which Gladstone wrote on Tennyson's second "Locksley Hall," in 1886, the year of his great defeat:—

The moment was hardly one in which, from a man of nature less great and powerful than Mr. Gladstone, we should have counted on a buoyant vindication of the spirit of his time. He had just been roughly repulsed in the boldest enterprise of his career; his name was a target for infinite obloquy; his motives were largely denounced as of the basest; the conflict into which he had plunged, and from which he could not withdraw, was hard; friends had turned away from him; he was old; the issue was dubious and dark. Yet the personal, or even what to him were the national discomfitures of the hour, were not allowed to blot the sun out of the heavens. His whole soul rose in challenge against the tragic tones of Tennyson's poem, as he recalled the solid tale of the vast improvements, the enormous mitigation of the sorrows and burdens of mankind, that had been effected in the land by public opinion and public authority, operative in the exhilarating sphere of self-government during the sixty years between the first and second "Locksley Hall."

"The sum of the matter seems to be that upon the whole, and in a degree, we, who lived fifty, sixty, seventy years back, and are living now, have lived into a gentler time; that the public conscience has grown more tender, as, indeed, was very needful; and that in matters of practice, at sights of evils formerly regarded with indifference, or even connivance, it now not only winces, but rebels; that upon the whole the race has been reaping, and not scattering; earning, and not wasting; and that, without its being said that the old Prophet is wrong, it may be said that the young Prophet was unquestionably right." (Gladstone in Nineteenth Century, January, 1887.)

Here is the way in which a man of noble heart and high vision as of a circling eagle, transcends his individual chagrins. All this opimism was the natural view of a statesman who had lived a long life of effort in persuading opinion in so many regions, in overcoming difficulty upon difficulty, in content with a small reform when men would not let him achieve a great one, in patching where he could not build anew, in unquestionable faith, hope, patience, endeavour. . . . The triumphs of the past inspired confidence in victories for the future, and meanwhile he thought it well to remind England that "their country is still young as well as old, and that in these latest days it has not been unworthy of itself" (III., p. 354).

The closing scenes of this great life Mr. Morley depicts with moving power, in the spirit of the passage from Dante's Convito, which he puts at the head of the chapter:—

Natural death is as it were a haven and a rest to us after long navigation. And the noble soul is like a good mariner; for he, when he draws near the port, lowers his sails and enters it softly with gentle steerage. . . . And herein we have from our own nature a great lesson of suavity; for in such a death as this there is no grief nor any bitterness; but as a ripe apple is lightly and without violence loosened from its branch, so our soul without grieving departs from the body in which it hath been.

Gladstone was not, indeed, suffered to depart without months of weary pain, but solaced by the tenderest care, and sympathy from many lands. "'The retinue of the whole world's good wishes' flowed to the 'large upper chamber looking to the sun-rising, where the aged pilgrim lay.' . . . A certain grandeur overspread the moving scene. Nothing was there for tears. It was 'no importunate and heavy load.' The force was spent, but it had been nobly spent in devoted and effective service for his country and his fellow men."

THE FOURTH GOSPEL.*

"WHETHER the Gospel traditionally assigned to the Apostle John was in reality composed by St. John and gives an historical account of the ministry and sayings of Jesus," this is, as Dr. Warschauer says, a question not only of deep interest, but of practical importance, for on the answer he gives to it a man's religious position must in great measure depend. It is, moreover, a question which every man or woman, who is at all concerned about religion, must contrive one way or another to find an answer to. Rightly enough the traditional answer has been the one which has hitherto prevailed, for the great majority have had no evidence accessible to them except such as was in support of the tradition, and that has been put forward again and again by the ablest disputants with all the force which strong conviction and wide learning could command. A man might have a fairly extensive knowledge of English theological literature, might have read Farrar, Westcott, Lightfoot, Watkins, Sanday, and if a Unitarian Sears and Peabody, and Abbott, and be ignorant that there really were formidable difficulties in the way of accepting the Gospel, and be unable to understand how honest and intelligent men could fail to acknowledge it as apostolic and historical. It is with the purpose of presenting some of the chief considerations which have prevailed with such men, often to their own worldly detriment, that Dr. Warschauer has composed this little treatise. In a hundred small 8vo pages of large print he has very clearly and succinctly stated the problem, and given his own solution with the reasons which have led him to arrive at it.

If what is our fourth were our only Gospel, and we knew nothing of Jesus except through its story, the case would be entirely altered, and we should be divided between two strong and opposite contentions; the one, that the evidence of this single witness of doubtful name and date was insufficient to support the immense weight of his narrative; the other, that it was morally impossible that a book of so great spiritual power, so simple and unaffected, so full of faith and devotion, could be a work of imagination, with no broad basis of solid fact. And these arguments do still, indeed, hold the field, and divide between them not only men but minds, so that the reader who tries to be unprejudiced will find himself constantly asking as he reads: Can it possibly be true? Can it possibly be only an invention?

But the case does not stand so. This Gospel is not the one account we have of the sayings and doings of Jesus, but the latest of four. Does the testimony of the earlier witnesses avail for the confirmation of wavering faith? Or does it tend to establish reluctant disbelief? I can hardly imagine any but one honest answer to these questions. It would be easier to accept the Fourth Gospel if it stood alone; the greatest difficulties connected with the problem arise from the comparison of its account with that of the Synoptics. It is the foremost of English apologists for the Johannine authorship who writes, "The Synoptist and St. John differ in the general impression which they convey as to the duration, the scene, the form, the substance of the Lord's teaching"; and Dr. Warschauer is only developing this admission of the late revered Bishop of Durham, when he writes:—

Let anyone read the narratives of Matthew, Mark, and Luke side by side, and he will find that with all their minor differences these documents agree as regards essentials, i.e., not only as to the general order of the events related, and as to the events themselves, but still more as to the character of Jesus, the mode of his teaching, his manner of speech and walk among men. He is, notwithstanding his supernatural powers, a very human person, full of sympathy with the common people, who hear him gladly because he speaks in the language understanded of them, the language of homely simile, enforcing his practical teaching by means of parables drawn from the every-day life of his hearers. . . . . Turn to the Fourth Gospel and the impression you receive is absolutely different; instead of the moral and religious precepts, clad in the simple yet wonderfully fresh and poetic form, to which the synoptists have accustomed us, we encounter a stately mysticism, utterly unlike the directness and epigrammatic terseness that mark the words of the Master as reported by Matthew, Mark, and Luke. We encounter, above all, a Jesus having little more than the name in common with the sublime teacher who uttered the sermon on the mount and many a golden parable (pp. 21, 22, 23).

Dr. Warschauer develops this argument with great force and plainness, so as to make it intelligible to the most unlearned reader, whom we must refer to his pages. The learned believer in the Gospel who would candidly weigh the arguments here briefly stated, and give an answer in the same manner, would confer a benefit on us all.

But impartiality in discussing this great question seems almost unattainable, and we cannot say that the case is here presented otherwise than as an able statement of the counsel for the prosecution. The theory that the Gospel was intended as supplementary to previous narratives is not appreciated at its full worth. The statement that "the Johannine Jesus has no moment's faltering—is without a human tremor or passing sense of reluctance," cannot, we think, be maintained. While the remark on the words addressed by Jesus to his mother at the marriage feast that "he turns upon her with an appalling asperity of unkindly rebuke, most unnatural and offensive," is an exaggeration less excusable than the opposite comment of Westcott's, "There is not the least tinge of reproof or severity in the terms. The address is that of courteous respect, even of tenderness." No doubt both writers desired and intended to be absolutely truthful, but nothing is harder than to make up one's mind distinctly as to what is the truth, and then set it forth with complete justice to the other side, the side you believe to be that of error. Dr. Warschauer has not attained to this highest merit of the controversialist, but he has done what is next best—set forth his own case and ours skilfully and in an easily intelligible manner.

SHORT NOTICE.

The Secret of the Universe and other Essays is a book which aims at a re-statement in modern words and in accordance with modern thought of the grounds and principles of religion. Religion in the light of the discovery of evolution as nature's method of progress, and evolution in the light of religious progress are here presented in a series of thoughtful essays. At times one feels the need of a preliminary discussion which shall settle the value of the terms to be used, and limit the scope of the inquiry. At other times one wonders where the principles laid down would lead if they could be expressed in life as firmly as they can be uttered in a sentence, "Love is the one bridge that will carry man safely over the chasm that separates the seen from the unseen." "The man who never sins against love is without sin; though in order to be true to love he may have to break certain man-made laws." These are sayings that require more development than is here given to them. Yet as an attempt to begin to do that which in our day urgently needs to be done; to explain the principles of religion so that they may be intelligible and credible to a man who knows something of science; and to aid the religious man to recognise in the man of science one whose investigations are of the utmost value for the illumination of the judgment, and the purification of the spirit of worship, the essays are interesting and suggestive. The volume would be more consistent in tone, if the last essay, that on Roman Catholicism, had been omitted altogether; its controversial style somewhat jars upon us, even though we fully agree with the writer. On the other hand, the study of "Jesus" was none the less interesting and profitable to the writer of this notice from the fact that only now and then could he find himself in complete agreement with the author of the essay. VI.

"For we know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come that which is in part shall be done away."

ALL that we do or learn is done by degrees, not all at once. If you learn a piece of music, you have to practise one bit after another till you know it, and then, when you come to join them all together, the piece comes to you as a whole with a new meaning. So in painting a picture; the artist paints in one figure and then another, and the perfect picture does not come till all the parts have joined together in the whole. If you learn a part to act in a play, it is nothing in itself, but is a piece of the whole.

And Paul shows this by the next sentence: "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child: now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things." He means that the little thoughts and feelings of a child are the beginnings, the first steps, the little parts in the play, and that just as all the parts merge into one play, so as you grow older they are left behind, and grow into things that are wiser and greater; as a little girl leaves her dolls behind her when she grows big; she puts away childish things, and keeps for greater things the love which she used to give to her doll.

"For now we see in a mirror, darkly; but then face to face." We cannot see and understand everything clearly yet; it is as if we saw the reflection of them in a mirror now, but by and by we may see them face to face. "Now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I have been known." I think this means that we only know God now "in part," only a little of what He is and does; but that when our spirits leave our bodies, and can understand and meet God's Spirit more perfectly, we shall know Him in the same sort of way that He has always known us. There will be no "mirror" then, but we shall look straight into the face of what we have been learning step by step, and see what it all means.

"But now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love."

Whatever else we leave behind us, we cannot live without these three. Faith is great, Hope is great; but the greatest of all is Love. And it is greatest because it is the one thing in which we are like God and are most His children; the more we love the more are we like Him; and love never faileth.

And now, children, it is Christmas, the time when love and peace fill our hearts, because love and peace were brought to earth more than ever before when Jesus came. The beautiful story comes back once more: the little baby, with the manger for his first cradle; his father and mother watching him so lovingly; the gentle eyes of the beasts, in whose stable he was born, gazing at him wonderingly; the shepherds and the wise men coming to see. And then you can fancy him, when he was a little older, playing in the village where he lived, and in and out of the carpenter's shop, where his father lived; but we have no stories in the Bible about that time. But when he was twelve years old he went with his parents for the first time to one of the great festivals at Jerusalem. The journey was about fifty miles, and he must have delighted in it, with all the new sights and experiences, for he had not been so far from home since he could remember. Most likely they joined with a number of friends and neighbours, who formed a caravan, with horses and donkeys, and camels for the weaker ones, and the rest walking; and no doubt there were other children going also. When they got the first sight of the city, with its splendid Temple shining in the sun, on the hill, surrounded by its walls, he must have gazed with wondering and reverent eyes. And then the days that followed, with the busy life of the city, the servicess in the beautiful Temple, the passing in and out through its passages and courts, how wonderful it all was to the village boy!

Then when the time came to return, the caravan started homewards, Jesus' parents never doubting that he was amongst the other children; and when at the end of the first day's journey they sought for him and could not find him, they went back to Jerusalem to look for him. After a long search they found him in the Temple, in a kind of school; there where there were teachers and wise men who could tell so much that he longed to know; and he was asking questions, and listening to what they said. And when his mother said, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? thy father and I sought thee sorrowing"; he answered, "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?" And he returned with them to Nazareth, and "was subject to them." And he "advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man."

That is the childhood of Jesus; and though it is little that is told us we are sure that he was a loving and noble child in every way. He too, like ourselves, "knew in part"; when he was a child he spake as a child, and felt as a child, and thought as a child, but the love that never faileth was in his heart all through his life, and grew with his growth till that which was perfect had come, and all that was "in part" was swallowed up in that same love that never faileth.

Dear children, may you follow him through a loving childhood, and through a loving manhood and womanhood, and onwards till you see no longer in a mirror darkly, but face to face; till you know not only in part, but even as you have been known.

Now abideth Faith, Hope, Love, these three; and the greatest of these is Love.

A HAPPY CHRISTMAS TO YOU ALL.

THE CHRISTMAS BENEDICTION OF THE YEAR.

ON the eve of Christmas these words are written, and they mark also the end of another year. The gladness of the festival comes always as the final benediction of the year; even where the shadows may be be gathered, the voices of the children make themselves heard, the promise of perennial hope, and through the giving of unselfish love the world is brought again into truer harmony with the divine Giver of all Good.

Thankfully we gather up the memories of the past year, which have been rich in blessing, and those things which have been hard to bear and are bitter to remember we bring into the light of the divine charity, and ask for the wisdom and the love that can endure and hope all things.

In this last number of the year we should naturally have published a retrospect, telling of its chief events and those things which have been of special moment in the life of our churches, but at the last moment we are called to another retrospect, and to pay our tribute of gratitude, honour, and affection to one who for many years has held a foremost place among us.

Dr. BROOKE HERFORD would be glad that we should link the thought of him with the happiness of this Christmas time, and it is well for us that as this year draws to a close we should receive the benediction of his earnest, kindly, and reverent spirit. He fought a good fight. The sound of his cheery voice still lingers in our heart. We feel the grip of his warm hand of friendship. With tender sympathy for the sorrowful, with manly faith, glad to be at rest, he has quietly passed to "where beyond these voices there is peace."

Reverently now, and thankfully, we may recall his own words :—

"The deeper and better life of the world moves steadily on, as ever, towards more and fuller being, towards further-reaching ends, and principles that want much more than this life to come to anything; and as this sense of more and fuller grows, it widens out into powers and possibilities quite beyond the limits of the earthly life.

. . . . .

"As TENNYSON has said—who is the very poet of the larger hope—

> Death's true name
> Is onward; no discordance in the roll
> And march of that eternal harmony
> Whereto the worlds beat time.

We know not how it is to be, or where. But somehow, somewhere, whether we wish for it or not, we know, by the dumb craving of the ordered world, as well as by the uttered hope of holiest souls, that GOD will yet fulfil us into something better than the fragments that we are. And so we wait, and work, and watch, and do the best we may, or bow our heads in sorrow that our doing is so much below our best—and as His laws ordain we let life go, or fall asleep, but always for some further greater life beyond the shadows and the sleeping."

"So let us have faith; life is not a delusion even at its lowest—let us not fear that it can play us false at its highest. As EMERSON said :—

> . . . . All things excellent
> As God lives, are permanent.

The 'life to come' is just as real as this—yet it is this—this—lasting not only beyond the body of to-day, or of next year, but beyond all visible things, among the unseen things which are eternal!"

THE CHERUBS. (RAPHAEL.)

OH! to be gazed at by such eyes,
Visioned so true for things above,
Full of such sweet surprise,
New born of sapient love.

Perchance you strayed from that great host
That continually do cry?
In sweet amazement lost—
And here your anthems die.

Or have you caught that trick of men,
Speech with gold silence to eclipse?
Proving most reverence when
Awed fingers press their lips.

Too near the earth perchance you flew!
Too near the earth that saddens song,
Too near to us you drew
From that angelic throng.

Or did that Poet-Painter take
Just two sweet babes of this our earth,
And granting wings, so make
Of them a heavenly birth?

The eyes he here, so thrilled, doth limn,
So full of wisdom and of love,
Perchance gazed up at him,
Raphael, painting above!

DR. BROOKE HERFORD.

Memoir.

A LIFE of great happiness and abundant activity, rich in all human sympathies, was brought to a close at Hampstead on Sunday evening, when Dr. Brooke Herford quietly fell asleep. Two years ago he suffered from a very serious paralytic seizure, following on other warnings that had come to him, and for months he hovered on the borders of life and death. Then last Christmas he seemed to gather fresh strength and awakened once more to the interests of life. During the past year he was able to see friends again, and much enjoyed being read to, and until quite recently, whenever the weather was at all possible, he was regularly taken out in his bath chair. His children had practically no warning that the end was so near. He saw accustomed visitors on Sunday, and in the evening enjoyed, as was his wont, the singing of familiar hymns. So he was settled for the night, but in less than an hour it was found that it was the last sleep into which he had most peacefully entered.

A veteran, and, in love and honour, among the chief of Unitarian ministers, Dr. Herford was hardly an old man, as we have grown accustomed to reckon old age, for he was only seventy-three; but he entered early into the field, and with heart on fire with zeal was not one to spare his strength. Thus he leaves the memory of a life complete in its achievement, so far as any can be complete that aims at high ideals, and to his children and a host of friends, in this country and in America, the possession of a love which will endure for the strengthening and encouragement of all that is best in them.

Brooke Herford was born at Altrincham, February 21, 1830, the eighth child and the sixth and youngest son of John and Sarah Herford. His father, a native of Upton-on-Severn, was of a Devonshire family; his mother was the daughter of Edward Smith, of Birmingham, a member of Dr. Priestley's congregation, and was born in the year of the riots, when the New Meeting and Priestley's house were destroyed by the mob. At Altrincham she had a prosperous school, while her husband established himself as a wine merchant in Manchester; but before her youngest son was two years old she died, and the family moved into Manchester, where Brooke Herford's boyhood was spent. He had some years at the Rev. J. R. Beard's school, and then was apprenticed to his father's business. When he was sixteen, having spent some months at Bordeaux, he settled in lodgings in Manchester with his elder brother Charles, who then took over the management of the business on their father's retirement.

Other interests, however, soon gained a complete mastery of his life. Charles and he both became teachers in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, where the influence of Travers Madge had made a very deep impression, and in the spring of 1848 Travers himself came back to Manchester as "Home Visitor" to the schools. Thus Brooke Herford was drawn into eager and devoted religious and social work, and before long determined that he must give himself up to it entirely, and enter the ministry. In his memoir of Travers Madge, published nearly twenty years later, may be found some record of the influences which moulded the young man's life, in the companionship of his elder brother and that other elder friend. It was a beautiful ideal of Christian brotherhood and discipleship, which inspired their work among the children and the young people of the schools; they were enthusiastic also as temperance reformers, and were eager to make the schools a centre of beneficent and happy home life.

Training for the Ministry.

When Brooke Herford declared his determination to be a minister, his father would not countenance the change; but the young man said he would live on bread and water, if need be, to gain his end. And when in October, 1848, he entered Manchester New College (then at Manchester) he did live on the barest supplies, and in the summer vacations would take his knapsack and a plaid on his tramps through the country, and sleep where he could, to save the expense of inns. That was the stuff he was made of, and it was good training for one whose ministry was to be essentially practical, for the helping of the people. With "little Latin and less Greek" he set himself resolutely to do the college work, and so far proved his capacity that in three years he was twice allowed to reckon a year gained, and in the summer of 1851 would have completed his course (which, as a rule, extended over five years), if it had not been for another call, which he held to be paramount. His close companionship with Travers Madge continued during the first half of his time at College, and he owed much also to the friendship of Philip Carpenter, then minister at Warrington.

When he himself went out to preach, as a student, he quickly made his mark, as one who could speak home to the hearts of the people; and so it came that while still at College he received a call to Todmorden. He proposed to resign his College bursary, but still to keep his classes in Manchester and so complete his course, but this the authorities would not sanction. He elected, therefore, to leave the College, and early in 1851, as a young man of twenty-one, settled at Todmorden. In the following year he married Hannah, daughter of Mr. William Hankinson, of Hale, whom he had come to know as one of the workers at Lower Mosley-street, and who for nearly fifty years sustained his ministry and enriched his life.

Early Ministry.

For five years Brooke Herford remained at Todmorden, and to the last retained a warm affection for the folk of that border town of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and for the scenes of his earliest ministry. Then, in 1856, he removed to Sheffield, and as minister of the Upper Chapel for nearly nine years did much to stimulate the zeal of the churches in the North Midland district, while gaining for himself no inconsiderable influence in the town as a fearless advocate of social justice and a preacher of a strenuous practical Christianity. The late P. W. Clayden, who in 1860 settled as minister at the High Pavement Chapel Nottingham, became his close friend and fellow worker in a zealous propagation of the Unitarian faith. In 1857 the North Midland Unitarian Mission was established, with the object of sustaining and extending the field of religious work both in the villages of Derbyshire and among the working people of the large towns of the district. During his Sheffield ministry the second congregation at Upperthrope was established, the church being opened in 1861, and three years later Christ Church, Nottingham, was also opened.

In September, 1860, Brooke Herford began the issue of Home Pages, a series of popular Unitarian tracts, continued for seven years.

To these reference was made in the INQUIRER of October 10, in a notice of the new series now being edited by his daughter. One of the last of the old series, in September, 1867, after his removal from Sheffield, was that in which Brooke Herford published his sermon on "Sergeant Brett's Keys," on occasion of the Fenian outrage in Manchester, when the sergeant of police, refusing to give up the keys of his prison van, was shot at his post of duty. That is a fine example of the fearless preacher's grip of the real issues of life; but most notable of all was an earlier tract on "Trade Outrages," publishing the address given in what was perhaps the greatest act of Brooke Herford's Sheffield ministry.

It was in December, 1861, when he was still only thirty-one. Conflict in the cutlery trade had grown very bitter, and there had been a number of cowardly outrages against non-union men. The last before the young preacher spoke out had been peculiarly distressing. A canister of gunpowder had been thrown through the window of a workman's house at night, and two women had been shockingly injured by the explosion. On this, Brooke Herford, who was known to the union leaders and had great sympathy with their movement, took the largest hall in Sheffield and announced a Sunday afternoon address on "Trade Outrages, and who is responsible for them." In those days of violence he must have known that he carried his life in his hand, for the hall was crowded and many embittered and passionate men were present. But he did not flinch, and faced them alone, taking for text the words: "Cursed is he that smiteth his neighbour secretly." He said that he would not allow any discussion, and had come here simply to deliver his message as a religious teacher, who wished well to their cause. And then he did not spare them, but denounced the shame and cowardice of such outrages and the injury done to the cause, pleading with the men for their own honour to put a stop to them. He was heard in silence to the end and no violence ensued; for if they were indignant at his words they respected the young man's courage, and in after years he had the satisfaction of feeling that he had not spoken idly or in vain. Such an incident showed what had gone to the making of a man.

In Manchester.

In October, 1864, Brooke Herford removed to Manchester, to succeed Dr. Beard as minister of the Strangeways Chapel, his elder brother William being at the same time (from 1866 to 1870) minister of the Upper Brook-street Church. Thus he returned to his own people, and to the scenes of his early life, and for eleven years gave the strength of his prime to the manifold labours of his ministry and other tasks which were laid upon him. The issue of Home Pages continued for some time, and in the year when they came to an end, he published his memoir of Travers Madge. While still at Sheffield he had become one of the four editors of the Unitarian Herald, founded in May, 1861, and in 1866 he and the late William Gaskell were left as sole editors. He also became a tutor at the Home Missionary Board, for the training of young men for the ministry, and on the death of his friend John Harland, in 1868, undertook to complete the new and revised edition of Baines's "History of the County Palatine and Duchy of Lancaster." Harland had only just completed the first volume when he died, and the second volume, "continued and completed by Brooke Herford," appeared in 1870. This work involved "the almost entire editing of the second volume," with thousands of corrections, including local histories of five-sixths of the county, a great part being almost entirely re-written. It meant, also, personal visits and investigations in most of the parishes. But while the task turned out to be far more laborious than had been anticipated, it was work after Brooke Herford's heart, for he had a keen interest in history and in antiquarian subjects, attracted always by their human interest. This was seen also in later years—as, for instance, in some papers he contributed to the Atlantic Monthly while in America, in which he argued for more historical reality in the Old Testament stories of the Patriarchs than recent critics have been inclined to allow. His most popular historical work was his delightful "Story of Religion in England," published in 1878, after he had gone to America, by the Sunday School Association.

While these other labours claimed a large share of his abundant energies, the full work of an active ministry in a great city was faithfully done, and Brooke Herford took his full share in the general life of the body to which he belonged. He was always a popular preacher at anniversary services, and a most welcome speaker at public meetings, full of genial life and pleasant humour, of hearty practical good sense and religious earnestness. At Whitsuntide, 1864, just before his removal from Sheffield, he preached the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, little thinking then that twenty-eight years later he would become the minister of that chapel. His subject was "Truth and Liberty," and the sermon aimed at mediating between two tendencies active among Unitarians, that their united strength might be thrown into practical religious work. The tradition of liberty inherited from the elder Nonconformists of the "Presbyterian" connection, he declared to be fundamental to healthy religious life, but no less so loyalty to truth, which led others to give the first place to the advocacy of Unitarian doctrine. There should be no antagonism, he pleaded, between these two interests, but truth and liberty should always go hand in hand. This was his position to the last. He was an ardent champion of Unitarianism, believing it to be the truest and most helpful form of Christianity; but at the same time he loved the traditions of the older churches. "I am almost a Presbyterian forefather myself," he said with a twinkle, in the course of one of the most recent discussions on this subject; and that old tradition, he was convinced, had established the right principle for our church fellowship. Simple Christian truth was for him the centre, and he held that it was strongest in the air of freedom, and would have power to keep the body sound and maintain itself against all comers.

Thus again, in 1885, coming over from Boston to visit old friends, he once more preached the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and taking for his subject "What is left after the questions of our time?" re-affirmed his faith in freedom, while pleading for trust in the central truths of the religious life and for personal discipleship to Christ. Three years later, in an article on Dr. Martineau's organisation scheme, reprinted in this country from the American Unitarian Review, he referred (in the English dedication) to "our traditional liberty and the truth to which it has brought us." As to organisation, his contention was that existing institutions, and particularly the Association and the National Conference, ought to be strengthened for more vigorous activities; and if one name for our churches must be chosen, it could only be Unitarian, with which the principle of freedom was so closely associated that there could be no danger of dogmatic narrowness or exclusiveness.

In these views Brooke Herford was confirmed by his experience of religious life in America, but they had already become a mature conviction while he was still at work in Manchester. His eleven years at Strangeways completed his first twenty-five years of active ministerial service, and the strain, especially of the last crowded years, had told severely on his strength. He felt that if his full usefulness was to be maintained, he must have rest and complete change. So he came to accept an invitation to America, and early in 1876 became minister of the Church of the Messiah in Chicago.

In America.

For sixteen years Brooke Herford was in America; the first six in Chicago, and for the rest of the time in Boston, as minister of the Arlington-street Church and successor to the pulpit made illustrious by the ministries of Dr. Channing and Ezra Stiles Gannett. He was forty-six when he settled in the States, and if he found the rest and refreshment that he sought in Chicago, it was through the plunge into entirely new conditions of a very strenuous life. He had many things to learn, but he learnt them, and gained a position of great influence and honour among American Unitarian ministers. In Chicago one thing he did after he had thoroughly taken his bearings was to urge the necessity of a Saturday half-holiday, and in pleading for this he told how when he went into business as a lad in Manchester no such thing was known there, and with what beneficent results it had been established. The result of his appeal was a definite movement in that direction.

Of his work in Boston we cannot give any full record, but he threw his whole strength into the work of his own church and of the denomination generally. He was one of the chief movers in the establishment of the Unitarian Church Building Loan Fund, established amid great enthusiasm at a Saratoga meeting of the National Conference. With the Rev. J. T. Sunderland he brought out The Unitarian, a vigorous missionary magazine, since absorbed in the Christian Register. He was one of the little company of ministers who began the mid-week noon services at King's Chapel, in the centre of the business part of Boston, services which were a great success and became a permanent institution in the city. In the spring of 1891 he held a series of Friday evening services in the Arlington-street Church, inviting ministers of different denominations to preach; and then on Good Friday the service was held in one of the largest churches in Boston, a Congregationalist church, when he took part in it with a Baptist minister and Phillips Brooks, then rector of Trinity Church. The Good Friday Union service also became an institution, and Phillips Brooks, when he became Bishop of Massachusetts, still continued to take part.

In that same year, 1891, Brooke Herford was appointed preacher to Harvard University, and in the summer received his degree of D.D. The opportunities of influence, not only through preaching, but through personal intercourse with the Harvard students, he valued very highly. But while he thus held a position both of influence and of emolument such as England could not offer to a Unitarian minister, he had never broken the ties which bound him to the old home, and had kept it constantly in view that duty might some day call him back. He recognised that the work was harder in this country and as greatly needed as in America, and at last, in the autumn of 1891, he felt that he must come back. He accepted an invitation to the pulpit of Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, in succession to Dr. Sadler, and with much pain to himself, and the keenest regret of his many friends in America, resigned his Boston charge.

Home Again.

Dr. Herford entered on his Hampstead ministry in February, 1892. Old friends delighted to have him in their midst again and to many new friends also his return to this country was a source of gladness and strength. He brought back the old zeal of his earlier manhood and the attractive power of a sunny and affectionate nature, and with these a new strength and confidence born of his American experience and the wisdom of a ripened age. In the first year, coming fresh from the wider field, which had been his in New England, he made an appeal at the Whitsuntide meetings for "Church extension among Unitarians," and following this up with a large amount of personal effort, succeeded in very largely increasing the income of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. He joined the committee of the Association, and in 1898 was elected President. The year before, he had given the Communion Address at the opening of the National Conference meetings at Sheffield, thus standing once more in his old pulpit, and in June, as representative of the Unitarians, had been present at Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee service on the steps of St. Paul's. In other ways he took a representative place, and a paper of his on "The Further Reformation Needed" was included in a volume of "Christian Conference Essays," published in 1900, with an introduction by the Bishop of Hereford. He served also on the committee of Manchester College.

A volume of Dr. Herford's sermons with the characteristic title, "Sermons of Courage and Cheer," was published in 1894, and in the following year a little volume, containing five lectures delivered in Rosslyn-hill Chapel, with the title, "The Forward Movement in Religious Thought as interpreted by Unitarians." In the spring of 1902, when he was already stricken with his last illness, another volume, "The Small End of Great Problems," with a capital portrait, appeared. In these sermons we can hear the familiar voice, and listen to the words of earnest and reverent faith, of confidence in the sacredness of life and its divine possibilities, and in the power of a lowly Christian discipleship. There is the appeal of wholesome common-sense and of a strong manhood, not without the tenderness of a compassionate heart and true Christian grace, and the love which is greatest of all.

For nine years Dr. Herford ministered in Rosslyn-hill Chapel (with the help from Midsummer, 1899, of the Rev. Edgar Daplyn), but latterly he had aged very rapidly, and, in 1901, which was also the year of his wife's death, he finally retired, having completed fifty years of ministerial service. The occasion was taken by a number of friends in this country and in America to make a personal gift to him of over £3,200, with warm expressions of gratitude and affection. The letter of thanks which he wrote, acknowledging this gift, concluded with the following words:—

> Would I could speak of any further work. My heart is in it, as ever, and with all who labour for it still, and will do in the time to come. But all I can do is to give them my Godspeed—the Godspeed of one who has seen the simple faith of our churches growing continually in the religious thought of the world.

At Christmas in that year Dr. Herford suffered the seizure, of which we have already spoken. His splendid constitution was slow to yield, and only on the second return of that festival has he been granted his release.

We will not wrong his memory by words of faithless sorrow. He would bid us be of good cheer, and look upon the beautiful and heavenward side of death. He leaves a happy memory, and we may well thank God for this gift of a good man's life.

The funeral service was held in Rosslyn-hill Chapel on Wednesday morning, followed by cremation at Golder's-green, and on Thursday the ashes were interred in the burial-ground of Hale Chapel, Cheshire, in his wife's grave. It was in that little country chapel that they were married fifty-one years ago. At Hampstead the service was conducted by the Revs. Henry Gow, J. Estlin Carpenter, and P. H. Wicksteed, at Hale by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson.

In Rosslyn-hill Chapel, which was already decorated with the tokens of Christmas, a very large and representative congregation was gathered. The three officiating ministers preceded the coffin as it was borne into the chapel, Mr. Gow reciting the sentences. He conducted the first part of the service, reading Psalm xc., and passages from 1 Cor. xv. Mr. Carpenter then read the Beatitudes and passages of triumphant faith from St. Paul, and afterwards offered prayer. Mr. Wicksteed gave an address inspired by deep feeling and intimate knowledge of his friend. This we hope to be able to publish next week. The address was followed by the singing of "Nearer, my God, to Thee," the Lord's Prayer and Benediction, pronounced by Mr. Wicksteed, bringing the service to a close. The committal service at the crematorium was conducted by Mr. Gow.

MR. GREGORY FOSTER.

THOMAS GREGORY FOSTER died at his residence at Clapham on Monday, December 21, within a few days of his eighty-eighth birthday.

He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1837. He sat for many years at the Clerkenwell County Court as deputy for the late Serjeant Manning, for whom he also frequently did duty as Recorder at Oxford, where he was well known.

He was an active member of the Unitarian body, was a trustee of the old Essex-street Chapel, at which he was a frequent worshipper while resident in London; he warmly supported the movement for the removal of the Trust to Kensington, and remained a trustee to the end of his life.

THE LONDON CENSUS RETURNS.

THE Rev. W. Wooding writes to point out an error in Mr. Perris's article last week in respect to Newington-green. It is a mistake to say that the morning service is for children only. "There are two services held at Newington-green every Sunday morning, an ordinary service in the chapel with an average attendance of about seventy-five, and a children's service in the school house at which about eighty children are usually present. The two services are held at the same time, and in the Daily News census returns were added together." Mr. Arthur Titford also writes, as secretary of the congregation, to say that the chapel should not have been described in the table simply as "Newington," but as "Stoke Newington," or "Stoke Newington Green."

THE CHRIST OF EXPERIENCE.

SIR,—It is no doubt true that there is not a single passage in the Synoptic Gospels where Jesus is represented as "kneeling with" the disciples, and saying "Our Father," in the sense of your esteemed correspondent, Mr. Grubb. But I venture to submit that there is plenty of evidence that Jesus shared the devotional attitude which my words were intended to describe. The expression "Our Father which art in heaven" was adopted from the popular usage of his time (Dalman, "The Words of Jesus," p. 188). The precise date of the present form of the collects of the Jewish liturgy may be still open to question. But there is every reason to believe that this title was a part of the current vocabulary of prayer. It may be fairly assumed, therefore, that in joining, as he habitually did, in the public worship of his people, Jesus accepted this language as the natural expression of his own faith. I find no hint that Jesus regarded this worship as inadequate. The prayer which he is said to have taught to his disciples began only with the invocation, "Father," according to its simplest form, Luke xi. 2. Is this term used in any different sense from that in which Jesus himself employs it, "Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from me," xxii., 42, cp. Mark, xiv. 36? The Lord's prayer contains no clause conveying it to the Father through the Son. The story of the returning wanderer depicts him as approaching with nothing more than the confession "Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight." Did the old man who ran and fell on his neck with kisses require that this should be presented by an "Advocate and Mediator" for the sake of whose "honour" he might graciously forgive? Surely these are the elemental facts of history in the teaching and practice of Jesus. When they are "fairly faced," they seem to me incongruous with the view that the religious experience of Jesus was in any sense different in kind from that of his fellow-countrymen, however it may have surpassed theirs in constancy, richness, and depth.

I do not believe, therefore, that Jesus ever interposed himself in prayer between his disciples and God. Into the philosophical difficulties of the mediatorial conception in this relation I will not now enter. The historical difficulties are grave enough. The language ascribed to Jesus in the two passages cited by Mr. Grubb, Matthew xi. 27 and Luke x. 22, appears to me so unlike the texture of the rest of the synoptic sayings, that I find it impossible to regard it as in any way certainly his. If we hold that Jesus did not assume the Messianic character till after the colloquy with the twelve at Cæsarea Philippi, we shall feel the exalted type of Messianic self-consciousness here attributed to him inconsistent with the reserve which marked his earlier ministry. The variations in the second century citations of the words further show that their form was not definitely fixed, though they, of course, attest the existence of this type of saying. The resemblance to the language of the Apostle Paul (and also of the Fourth Gospel) may be interpreted in more than one way. It is possible that such an utterance as this expresses rather the devotional mood of the church in its rising consciousness of the place of Christ in its religious scheme, than the actual attitude of the teacher himself. The attempt to answer the question "What started such speculations?" would carry me into a disquisition unsuited to the limits of your columns. It must suffice to refer the student to the accumulating mass of evidence concerning contemporary belief in a vast hierarchy of superhuman powers and influences, in which an exalted place was naturally soon found for the risen Messiah.

The authenticity of the words "Come unto me" is also a question of great delicacy. We rightly approach them full of the reverent feeling kindled by the sense of what they have meant to generations of humble and devout believers. But the fact remains that the phrases are again and again the phrases of ancient prophecy. That is no reason why Jesus should not have used them, nor even why he should not have put deeper meanings into them. But I cannot see that they imply any kind of universal or permanent mediation between us and the Father. Read the invitation of the Son of Sirach:—

> Draw near unto me, ye unlearned,
> And lodge in the house of instruction.
> Say, wherefore are ye lacking in these things,
> And your souls are very thirsty?
> I opened my mouth, and spake,
> Get her for yourselves without money.
> Put your neck under the yoke,
> And let your soul receive instruction:
> She is hard at hand to find.
> Behold with your eyes,
> How that I laboured but a little,
> And found for myself much rest.

There is, let it be granted, a difference of note, but is it a difference between the human and the divine? The reader who comes to the Gospel words with the prior conviction of the Deity of Christ, will naturally put on them a higher value than the student who interprets his consciousness after the analogy of one whom God anointed with holy spirit and with power, who went about doing good? But does he, therefore, necessarily interpret them more correctly?

MONTHLY NOTES FOR SUNDAY CLASSES.*

SIR,—Will you allow me to call the attention of your readers to the little magazine which the S.S. Association is now bringing out for use in our Sunday-schools and in our families. I want now to plead for the young people in our congregations; and to say that our Association is anxious to assist them as well as the general S.S. scholar, so that we shall be very glad to know that "Monthly Notes" is helping home-classes, classes presided over by parent, or sister, or brother.

* For particulars of "Monthly Notes" please see advertisement on last page.

I often wonder how long it will be before the members of our household of faith will realise that the law of cause and effect operates just as surely with our position as with everything else. We frequently complain of leakage; but how much trouble do we take to prevent the warping of the planks which makes such leakage possible? We say that we do not wish our young people to become dogmatic and rigid; and yet, are we helping them to avoid this rock of offence by drawing forth, by educing, a more scientific attitude of mind, and by giving them a wider outlook? We do not teach our boys and girls of to-day that the earth is the centre of the universe, and leave them to work out for themselves all the problems from which their forefathers learnt that that theory was erroneous, although with regard to our theology we too often adopt that plan; and then we are surprised and pained when we find that our children have followed the "line of least resistance," and have drifted along with the tide of popular opinion, in whichever direction that has happened to flow.

Our friends in Amsterdam told us that in the Dutch Liberal Churches all young people, between 12-18 years of age, follow a five years' graduated course of religious and theological study, in order that that side of their nature may be developed as well as the other. If, during the coming year, our "Monthly Notes" are found to be useful, perhaps some such scheme may be taken in addition to its present one; but now I will content myself with inviting the attention of parents and young people to its columns, asking them to consider whether they do not think it worth while to accept the assistance that is offered therein.

MARIAN PRITCHARD,
President S.S. Association.

PASSIVE OBEDIENCE.

SIR,—Some time ago you were good enough to publish a letter from me in which I stated in general terms the grounds of my adoption of the policy of Passive Obedience. The time for action has now come, and I have this day sent the following letter to the rate collector of Nottingham:—

December 18, 1903.

DEAR SIR,—I enclose cheque for £4 10s. 5d. for general district rate. I have deducted 2d. in the £ as a protest against the dishonourable and unjust action of the Government in connection with the Education Act. The remainder of the rate I refuse to pay voluntarily, and I therefore leave you to collect it by other methods provided by the law. I regret the necessity for giving you this trouble; but, after looking at the matter in every light, I feel that duty demands that I should make this protest in the interests of political honour and of civil and religious liberty.—Sincerely yours,

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

May I be permitted to say that the further this controversy proceeds the more indubitable does it seem to me that the step I have taken is at once expedient and right? The recent declaration of war by the Archbishop of Canterbury has intensified an already strong conviction.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, Dec. 18.

HUNGARIAN LETTER.

LET me first say a few words of our Synod, which was held in the country on the 23rd and following day of August. It was a glorious gathering from all parts of the country. Imagine a small village of 800 inhabitants without an inn receiving hundreds of strangers! But our good people open their doors with pleasure and entertain their guests heartily. The Székely people are farmers, but they live in well-built and comfortable houses, which are neat and clean. The whole village was nicely decorated. Everybody could see that here was an extraordinary occasion.

We came together on a Saturday, when the Francis Dávid Association held its annual meeting. This association was established nineteen years ago, and has since done a great deal to awaken religious zeal and pure moral feeling. The reports of the secretary (Professor Boros) and of the treasurer (Professor Gálfi) were quite satisfactory. We heard a fine address from Baron Horváth, president, and an excellent paper from M. Koxma, school inspector of Kolozs county. The singing also was very good. The Dávid Association consists of 1,700 members, men and women. It publishes a monthly paper for general readers, and a bi-monthly for women, both religious. The association has twelve district societies, which do very good service in country places.

The Synod opened on Sunday. As usual the bishop and two lay-presidents were in the chair. Hon. G. Daniel opened the meeting with a very good address. Bishop Ferencz gave his annual report of the chief events. Mr. Csifó acted as secretary, who, however, has retired from this office and accepted the Kolozsvár pulpit, vacant through the death of Mr. Moses. The statistics of last year show a fair increase. The activity of the congregations was quite satisfactory. Many of them are very poor indeed, but the members give from their small means freely. Every year the opening of some newly built and renovated churches is recorded. If we bear in mind that the Roman Catholic bishop of Transylvania, a very rich man, spends more than 200,000 crowns (£10,000) yearly from his private income on church propaganda, the zeal of our people is surprising. To make the case more clear, let me tell that in places where there is a Unitarian or a Protestant congregation whose members pay a large fee, the Roman Catholic bishop pays from his own purse instead of the people, and thus gives a good chance to the members of the other congregations to save themselves from church expenses.

On Sunday the Rev. E. Löfi preached a very good sermon, and the bishop gave his synodical address to the audience, more than half of whom could not enter the church. In order to give a chance to the outsiders a minister preached to them in the open air. Afterwards the Lord's Supper was distributed.

The consistory meetings were carried on before and after service, and in the evening, for the sake of the young people, a ball was given.

Next day was the ordination of the new ministers. This year five theological students entered the ministry, who were ordained together with the former ones. The ordination service was very touching in many respects. Fifteen young ministers, all of them well equipped for the high call, presented a fair sight. The Rev. N. Józan, of Budapest, preached the sermon, and Bishop Ferencz gave the ordination address. Both were utterances of true eloquence, fully appreciated by the crowded audience.

I must mention as a welcome proof of our progress that the new congregations in the Hungarian part of the country have this year been formed into a new district under the leadership of a dean and two lay curators. The Rev. N. Józán was elected dean, and the son of our chief curator, Dr. Gabriel Daniel, vice-president of the House of Commons, and Mr. Josef Kovacs were elected curators. Dr. Daniel has just received from the King the high distinction of Privy-Councillor.

It will interest your readers to hear that the Francis Dávid Association of Budapest began its winter work in October. A Lutheran theological professor, Dr. Masznyik, read a paper on the Sermon on the Mount. His liberal thinking and great sympathy towards Unitarianism surprised the Unitarians very pleasantly. His pupils greeted him in a telegram, and great interest was awakened all through the country in liberal and orthodox circles. On November 14 your correspondent had the pleasure of reading a paper on Francis Dávid as reformer of religion. A large audience paid deep attention to the noble career of the great martyr. When his prison life was dealt with, tears were seen on the faces of the ladies, many of whom did not belong to our household of faith. Fine singing and Mr. Józan's poem for the occasion completed the successful evening, which will be remembered for a long time.

With joy do I record that on November 8 the first country church in Hungary proper built this year in Tüzesgyarmat was opened. A year ago about 300 well-to-do land-owning peasants joined us. Since then they opened a public school, and now this nice new church. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association also came to their aid, for which they send hearty thanks. One ought to see how zealous and ready-hearted these good-looking Hungarians of the Magyar-Netherlands are. The Rev. N. Józan may well be proud that his first year as dean is crowned with such fine results. We are glad to know that two young Unitarians, Dr. John György, at Manchester College, and Miss Elizabeth Kilyéni, a teacher of a State high school, are now staying in your country, and will help to make our old friendship deep and lasting, to the glory of our common heavenly Father.

GEORGE BOROS.

Koloszvár.

Do not our failures and mistakes often come from discouragement? Does not every human being need a believing second self, whose support and approbation shall reinforce one's failing courage? The saddest hours of life are when we doubt ourselves. Am I really a miserable failure, a poor, good-for-nothing, abortive attempt? In such crises we need another self to restore our equilibrium.—Mrs. H. B. Stowe.

RELIGION AND ENVIRONMENT.

A LAY PREACHER'S ADDRESS.

THE following is a résumé of an address on "The Lay Preachers' Duty in Relation to Human Environment," delivered by Mr. F. Lawson Dodd, L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S., at a Lay Preachers' Conference at Essex Hall, on Thursday, Dec. 10, in connection with the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties :—

It was necessary, he said, to recognise the changed position of the preacher with regard not only to what might be called secular learning, but also with regard to changed economic conditions. The priest and the monk were giving place to the minister and clergyman, who are far nearer in their manner of life to the ordinary layman. Indeed, it was inevitable that the layman, with his knowledge of science as well as of life in the ordinary sense, would become more and more the religious teacher of the future. This was the direction of the new reformation founded by such great thinkers as Channing and Martineau. The preacher's appeal would have to be not alone to what is called the supernatural, but also to nature itself. His message must direct itself to the physical, the moral, the intellectual, as well as to the spiritual side of man. In this way it would not leave out of account the environment of the soul. It would recognise that spiritual power in the individual was hampered or suppressed by its surroundings.

Personal precepts were good in spiritual things, as in matters of health, but were they sufficient? Could there not be a spiritual appeal to the collective conscience to alter the environment for the sake of the weaker? The preacher then must recognise the force of environment in its widest sense. Darwin has once for all established the importance of the influence of surroundings on the physical organism, and it was important to study his conclusions, for there were springing up two schools of thought of diametrically opposite kinds. One, the Neo-Darwinian, applied Darwin's conclusions as to physical environment, to man's nature as a whole. This involved not only denial of free will, but of all moral and spiritual power on the part of mankind; and hence it led to a paralysing fatalism. Applying this doctrine to the question of alcoholism, Dr. Archdall Reid maintained that moral suasion, legislative interference, &c., had all been futile, and that the only alternative was that of natural selection, which would act by weeding out the weakest, and producing a race of moderate drinkers who would drink without personal or social injury. On the other hand, we had the extreme evangelicals, who maintained that spiritual conversion was the one and only thing needful, that with this inner change, all environment was powerless for evil. These thinkers were strangely enough supported in their methods by Christian scientists and faith-healers, who maintained that the soul was supreme even in the matter of a fractured limb.

Both these lines of thought contained truth; but not the whole truth. And was it not time for the religious teacher to say where he was in this matter? In making our appeal to the inner power, we must not disregard the outer. We must consider that man alone can mould his environment, and thus has control of one of the great forces that move him. If this is true, is it no part of religious teaching to say how things shall be modified that the soul may have freer life? What is the outer environment of the soul? The body comes first; then the house in which the body lives, then the society in which one is brought up; then there is the country, climate, &c. How frequently we see spiritual vitality lowered on account of bodily disease. Improper care of the body leads to endless sources of sin; men have been known to battle against temptation of a physical kind for years, which was removed by an alteration in the habits of the body. The struggle for money, overcrowding, factory routine, and dull monotony, the pressure of custom, the tricks and dishonesty of trade, the habit of drinking, gambling, and sensual suggestion, all warped and cramped the development of the soul of man, and would all be rendered less injurious if we took them in hand as a part of our religious teaching.

The preacher of the future must not disregard the physical and social life of man, any more than the doctor of the future must disregard the moral and spiritual life of his patients. The minister and layman both feel the pressure of human environment, more than the monk or priest, and their duty would become plainer when they realised that sociology and public health had been, and still were, part of the great religions of the East, and must become part of the religions of the West, if they are to succeed. The preacher of the future must know the outer life as well as the inner, and help to build up both. His two great functions are: To call upon the inner power to awake—to call upon men to be Christs—to press forward and take up the inner life adapted to the future. Then he should make a spiritual appeal to men, and so alter the conditions of environment that it should become possible for Christs to live.

Those who are interested in public health are trying to adapt surroundings so that men's bodies may live, and we must alter the methods of life, so that men's souls may survive. The death-rates of men's souls in present conditions of industry had yet to be decreased. It was useless to plead that obstacles were good, it is impossible but that causes of offence will come, and not only woe! unto him through whom they come, but also woe! unto him who did not seek to lessen and remove them. Obstacles do bring out strength, yes, but they absorb force, which might be set free for higher and nobler tasks. The aim and end of life seemed not to be the attainment of moral and spiritual victories, but rather the building up of a stronger and healthier physical, as well as moral and spiritual life. We need not fear that obstacles can all be removed, and it is our duty continually to remove those that are nearest, that men and humanity may approach nearer to their grandest ideal.

"THE SUN'S DARLING."

THE performance given by Mr. Savage Cooper and his friends on Friday week at the Portman Rooms, in aid of the funds of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, was of quite unusual interest, both for its excellence and because the form of entertainment chosen was one rarely presented nowadays. "The Sun's Darling," a moral masque, written by John Ford and Thomas Dekker, two of the best known Jacobean dramatists, was first performed at Whitehall in 1623 before James I. and his queen, and later at the Cock-pit in Drury-lane. The original is to be found at the British Museum. The version given on Friday night was specially arranged by Mr. Savage Cooper.

The piece appears to be an attempt to draw an analogy between the life of man and the progress of the seasons. It is in five acts. The first opens in the Temple of the Sun. Here we find Raybright (the Sun's Darling), grandson of Phœbus, longing for wider experiences—his request to Phœbus that he may for one year enjoy the pleasures of the varying seasons is granted, and the young man goes gladly forth with Folly for his companion.

He first visits the Garden of Spring. With that alluring goddess are Youth, Health, and Delight, and for a time his happiness is complete. But Folly introduces him to the Lady Humour—the personification of caprice and love of change. Under her influence Raybright soon begins to see things in another light. Spring ceases to charm him, and in spite of her entreaties and reproaches he forsakes her to follow Humour to the Court of Summer. Here again Humour will not long allow him to be happy. He seeks further change. At the court of Autumn he is warmly welcomed by Pomona and her servant Plenty. Fortune and Cupid offer him their homage in some charming rhymed couplets, which we would gladly quote did space allow. Pomona presents him to her lord, Autumn. In the revelries which ensue, Raybright becomes intoxicated, to the disgust of Humour, who persuades him to abandon these coarse delights for the sober but more satisfying pleasures of Winter. His entrance to that icy realm is at first opposed by rustic clowns whom Winter reproves in a speech upholding the divine right of kings—probably intended by the authors as a compliment to James I. Winter and his spouse Bounty entertain the young prince royally, with songs and dances, in which the four elements, Earth, Air, Fire, and Water, take part, together with four quaint characters representing the complexions—or temperaments—namely Blood, Phlegm, Choler, and Melancholy. After the dance Humour again asserts herself, enticing Raybright from his present happiness with memories of Spring. In vain Winter offers to point him out a path to Paradise. Raybright would willingly go thither, but Humour cannot accompany him, and she will not set him free. "Quicken thy spirits, Raybright," she cries; "I'll not leave thee. We'll run the self-same race again." And he, catching her enthusiasm, echoes, "To the Spring! I am resolved." At this point Phœbus suddenly appears and tells the young man there is no going back. The springtime of childhood, Summer's youth and Autumn's manhood lead on to the Winter of age and cannot be enjoyed again.

The masque is written partly in somewhat irregular blank verse and partly in rhymed couplets, and is interspersed throughout with songs. There are many really beautiful passages.

The performance reflected great credit on all concerned. Even the minor characters were effectively represented, and it would be difficult to speak too highly of the principal performers. Mr. Spencer Geach was an admirable Raybright, earnest, picturesque, and spirited. Mr. Savage Cooper, as his attendant Folly, made the most of a quaint and amusing part; his antics provoked much mirth. The important rôle of Humour was also cleverly rendered, but we must refrain from further enumerations of the special excellences of the several parts. The original music of the masque is not extant, but the songs have been successfully reset for this production to old airs of the sixteenth and early seventeenth century. The dances were quaint and entertaining, and the dresses both appropriate and beautiful.

We heartily congratulate Mr. Savage Cooper and Mr. Sydney Baynes, the director of the music, on a most artistic and delightful performance. The audience was large and appreciative.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Astley.—A sale of work for providing working expenses was held on Saturday, December 12, Mr. Percy H. Leigh, of Worsley, presided at the opening ceremony, which was performed by Mr. W. Eckersley, of Lowton. Friends were present from Atherton, Leigh, Monton, Swinton, and Stands. The proceeds amounted to £63.

Boston.—On Sunday evening, December 13, the Rev. W. Stoddart conducted a special service in memory of the late Mrs. Charles Wright, who passed away on December 2, at Shanklin, Isle of Wight. Mrs. Wright, who took a sympathetic interest in Spain-lane Chapel, of which her husband was one of the trustees, was a daughter of the late John Wright, who in early life was minister at Lynn, and afterwards at Sunderland, where he resided for many years.

Chelmsford.—On Monday evening a presentation was made to Mr. A. Madocks, of a handsome oak and silver-plated inkstand, on his retirement from the secretaryship of the Unitarian church, after twenty-five years' zealous service.

Colne.—In connection with the Ladies' Guild a fancy sale was held on Saturday afternoon last, the proceeds amounting to £18.

Horwich.—The annual Christmas party and entertainment was held last Saturday. Some of the young people acted "The Sleeping Beauty" in Stead's "Book for the Bairns," and a fine Christmas Tree was sent by Mrs. Smithells.

Holywood (County Down).—On Thursday, December 10, a most interesting lecture was given in the Holywood Town Hall, by Rev. L. Tavener, of Ipswich. The subject was "Edward Fitzgerald and Omar Khayyam.'" It was illustrated by a series of interesting limelight views of scenes connected with the life of Fitzgerald, and by a number of finely suggestive designs, of unique interest, which vividly portrayed the successive moods and thoughts set forth in Omar's poem. The lecture was followed by a performance of the song cycle, "In a Persian Garden," the words of which are selected from the Rubaiyat of Omar, and set by Liza Lehmann to music which amply reflects their spirit. The lecturer gave an effective account of various interesting episodes in the quiet life of Fitzgerald, many of them gathered from his own inquiries and researches in Suffolk, where "Old Fitz" is still well remembered, and then Mr. Tavener proceeded to an analysis of the main course of thought in Omar's poem. The entertainment was organised in aid of the Belfast Working Boys' Home, in which the late Mr. A. M. Munster (for many years a faithful member and office-bearer in the First Presbyterian Church, Non-subscribing, of Holywood) took the greatest interest; and it was a complete success.

London: Kentish Town.—On Sunday evening last there was a special musical service for Christmas in the Free Christian Church. The choir was for the first time seated in the chancel, and in addition to the usual hymns, there were Christmas carols and solos from the "Messiah," with an eloquent sermon from the minister, the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., from the words, "Go ye forth to meet him."

Stockport.—A very successful sale of work was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday and Thursday, December 9 and 10, with a view to the reduction of the debt (about £300) occasioned by the recent renovation of the church. The sale was opened by Mr. Ald. J. G. Johnson, J.P. One new feature in the sale was the Young Men's Stall, for which they had worked with most praiseworthy enthusiasm, making it a great success. A large number of friends attended, and the result was beyond expectation—viz., the raising of about £130.
